From the confusion of last summer arose widespread clamor for some control over materials allocation which would increase schedule and balance supply with the war demands. At that time production was falling steadily behind the projected goals. New facilities were being built with critical materials needed to make end products. Meanwhile, many component parts were produced in excess of the numbers required for immediate assembly, while other components lagged. As a result, completed end products fell short of the goals forecast. Large inventories of certain critical materials were simultaneously being hoarded.

Many observers disputed the contention that material shortages were primarily responsible for the break-down of the program. They argued that in the absence of any over-all program for increasing supplies and for scheduling the flow of war production from the raw material to the end product, break-down was inevitable. They contended that such scheduling was impossible under the existing methods of procurement and production. They pointed out that the War Production Board, granted sweeping powers by Executive order in January, had transferred its authority to the military and other procurement agencies. They insisted that the War Production Board must resume final authority, and—many added—actual operating control over procurement and production.

Your subcommittee has examined the controlled-materials plan. We find that it is a method of gearing the distribution of materials to the existing system of contract award. It underwrites the present control of the armed services and the other contracting agencies over procurement and production. It reinforces the present practice of distributing the bulk of the contracts to a limited number of large war producers, and places in the hands of the individual prime contractor control of the flow of material to producers of component parts.

The operations of the controlled-materials plan were outlined in part as follows in the general instructions issued on November 14, 1942, to those operating under it:

"The controlled-materials plan provides for the division of available supplies of controlled materials among the various claimant agencies in the interests of the most efficient use of these controlled materials in war production, and for the further division of the supplies of materials by the claimant agencies to their prime and secondary consumers.

"The plan contemplates centralized control by the War Production Board over the division of controlled materials among the claimant agencies and appropriate accounting so that no agency can overdraw its allotment. Detailed responsibility for the distribution of controlled materials through specific allotments to programs and schedules is decentralized—first, in the claimant agency primarily responsible for each program; and secondly, in the consumers responsible for each schedule.

"Responsibility for the preparation of bills of material shall be upon the claimant agency, with reference to the War Production Board, and upon the prime consumers, with reference to the claimant agency. This shall not prevent a claimant agency from working with secondary consumers in cooperation with the prime consumers insofar as is necessary to direct the preparation of accurate bills of material for subcontracted items."

The claimant agencies named above are principally the procurement agencies of the Army, Navy, Maritime Commission, and Lend-Lease Administration, and the Office of Civilian Supply. The prime consumers named above are chiefly the 100 largest war contractors having approximately 80 percent of all war contracts by dollar volume.

Controlled Materials Plan attempts to limit demand to supply. It resolves the conflict and competition of the several military procurement offices and of their prime contractors through a materials-quota system. Controlled Materials Plan is not a production program. It is not a scheduling plan. Before this subcommittee Mr. Eberstadt, presently responsible for Controlled Materials Plan, stated that Controlled Materials Plan is neutral with respect to programming and scheduling. The testimony submitted before us indicates that in fact Controlled Materials Plan reinforces a system in which both authority and responsibility are dispersed among the independent claimant agencies, who, in turn, have delegated their responsibilities to the prime contractors. It leaves the War Production Board which is nominally responsible for production without substantial check or control over any phase of production.

The quota system, which is the core of Controlled Materials Plan, has already been in operation with respect to the manufacture and distribution of machine tools since last May. Testimony of representatives of the Tools Divisions of both the War Production Board and the Army-Navy Munitions Board and of the individual prime contractors, revealed that under this little Controlled Materials Plan for machine tools there was no systematic procedure for checking requests for new machine tools against already available idle facilities. The various claimant agencies were nominally responsible for such checking, but each individually could not do so, and it was frankly admitted before this committee that the prime contractors' requests for machine tools were not properly checked.

This little Controlled Materials Plan has permitted prime contractors to accumulate large numbers of new machine tools and other facilities without reference to the large amount of capacity already available in the aggregate of small manufacturing plants.

Lack of machine tools in plants of prime contractors, under this system, has bottlenecked and delayed a number of important armament-production programs. Thousands of small plants which could have broken these artificially created bottlenecks have been shut down.

The final and fundamental shortcoming of Controlled Materials Plan is its basic assumption that raw materials are the limiting factor in the war production program. From this assumption the plan proceeds to a division of the assumedly fixed material production flow. Repeatedly since the beginning of America's defense program, assumptions that our flow of material supplies was necessarily limited to a given level of production have been disproved. It has been demonstrated that the chief factor determining the availability of supplies of many materials is the utilization of technology and manpower and that the supply of these raw materials can be expanded or contracted according to needs of the war effort. The Controlled Materials Plan by its very organization continues that static approach toward raw material production which has thus far delayed the provision of adequate supplies of steel, copper, aluminum, rubber, magnesium, and other critical materials.

If Controlled Materials Plan were properly related to genuine production planning and scheduling it would form an indispensable part of an over-all production program. Doubtless under the able leadership of Mr. Ferdinand Eberstadt this will become the eventual function of Controlled Materials Plan, but as first conceived and as presently set up, Controlled Materials Plan will not operate as a part of procurement planning.

In summary, Controlled Materials Plan will act only as a method of preventing the present inadequate military procurement services from paralyzing the war production program by their competition and conflict over facilities and materials. It would appear that Controlled Materials Plan is the capstone to the present inadequate structure. It is, as it were, a guarantee that the present defects will be prevented from blowing the whole system apart.

SCHEDULING

Controlled Materials Plan is no substitute for a production program operated by a centralized civilian agency exercising control over procurement. Until such an agency is in operation the Controlled Materials Plan will interfere with any attempts at scheduling.

To date what passes for scheduling has been done by the armed services and other contracting agencies. This should more accurately be called forecasting, and it has been highly inaccurate even as a forecast. These so-called schedules bear no relation to any over-all program of war production combined by a central agency supervising the separate contracting agencies. Indeed, these forecasts are not even integrated within the contracting agency as between the several end-products required. In fact, there is no adequate scheduling of components for an individual end-product.

The incapacity of the armed services and other contracting agencies individually to carry out scheduling for the war-production program is demonstrated in the current agreement of the armed services to return control over scheduling to the War Production Board. The reported terms of this agreement leave control over production and procurement in the present contracting agencies and hence will not accomplish the objectives embodied in S. 2871.

Temporarily the effect of this agreement will be a truce in which the vice chairman in charge of production will have a chance to demonstrate his proposed plans for scheduling and expediting aircraft production, subject to the limitations inherent in the retention of control over procurement and production in the hands of the armed services. Without a staff on his own, the vice chairman in charge of production must rely on the existing procurement organizations.

Control over materials cannot solve the flow of end products, and without a scheduling plan which works back from production of end products it may actually be disruptive of the productive program. Today the statement of requirements in terms of end products is in the hands of the armed services and the other contracting agencies and is not subject to review by any central agency. There is no balancing of these statements of requirements. Cut-backs of proposed output arising from alleged material shortages are not adjusted on any basis of over-all consideration of the capacity of our war production economy in terms of end products.

To expect that the vice chairman in charge of production can schedule even critical items without a return of procurement and production control to the War Production Board is almost certainly to predetermine the failure of the attempted scheduling. If, however, the present attempt demonstrates the need of such control, it will have served a useful purpose.

Scheduling must, to be an ultimate success, be built into the structure described in S. 2871, where it can be related to the work of other agencies, such as the Office of Manpower Supply. The Committee on Requirements and Program stipulated in S. 2871 will bring together the information needed to relate the flow of materials to the available manpower and facilities.

Startling examples of the failure to properly schedule the component parts of military items were brought to the committee's attention. As is well known, our aircraft program is behind schedule, and it would appear from testimony before the committee that this is primarily due to a failure to schedule the thousands of component parts flowing to the fabricating units.

One plane manufacturer illustrated his difficulties to the committee. A billet of steel to produce an 8-foot steel pipe was, according to schedule, to be in the August "melt" of the steel industry. However, this billet was not included in the August "melt." It was not in the September "melt" and not in the October "melt." At the time of the committee's hearings, the middle of November, this production executive had crossed the continent in search of some person in authority who could guarantee that this billet of steel would be kept in the November "melt." After seeing many officials on the west coast and at Wright Field, Dayton, Ohio, a friend introduced him to a colonel in the War Department in Washington who said that he could keep the billet in the November "melt." However, the executive preferred to wait until the pipe was delivered before being confident that it would be delivered. It is relevant to state that this billet of steel was ordered in May for delivery in September. It may have been delivered in December.

When similar difficulties in obtaining similar components exist, it is easy to understand why we are behind schedule and it is not difficult to understand that the scheduling of components is the key to maximum war production at the present time.

Hundreds of items similar to this steel billet are involved in the finished aircraft. If any one of these items is held up or is not properly scheduled, the manufacturer can only resort to substitutes and improvisation, but there is a limit to improvisation. This is demonstrated by our present failure to meet our aircraft production program.

MANPOWER MOBILIZATION

The Nation and the Congress are thoroughly familiar with present difficulties in mobilizing manpower. The Tolan and Truman committees have reported to the Congress that centralized civilian control of all manpower agencies is desperately needed to develop an intelligent manpower policy which will meet the needs of industry for skilled labor and the needs of the armed services for manpower.

On December 5, the President issued Executive Order No. 9279 conferring broad powers on the War Manpower Commission. The principal points established by this order appear to be:

1. Transfer to the War Manpower Commission of the Selective Service System.

2. Directing the Secretaries of War and Navy to consult with the chairman before determining the number of men required to be selected each month through the Selective Service System.

3. Restricting voluntary enlistment for the armed services.

4. Authorizing the Chairman to take all lawful and appropriate steps to channel all hiring through the United States Employment Service or to accord with such arrangements as the Chairman may approve.

5. Authorizing the Chairman to designate establishments, occupations, or areas of greater and less essentiality and to supervise transfer of workers in such establishments.

6. Conferring on the Chairman power to prevent or relieve inequities or hardships arising from his operations described in (4) and (5).

7. Making the Chairman a member of the Economic Stabilization Board.

By giving to the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission a voice in establishing the rate and magnitude of withdrawals to military service, the new Executive order pointed toward the first requisite of a manpower policy. A definite figure of manpower needed by the armed services must be determined and a time schedule planned for withdrawals from civilian industry. The necessary recruiting and training policies for industrial and agricultural manpower cannot be developed outside this framework.

By placing Selective Service under the War Manpower Commission and restricting voluntary enlistment the new Executive order recognizes that occupation must become the primary basis for future deferments. Industry cannot be stripped of essential manpower by voluntary enlistment and by haphazard action of 6,500 local selective service boards, each subject to community pressures unrelated to occupational needs. These boards have considered the filling of military quotas their first responsibility. They lack information and are not technically qualified to pass upon industrial and agricultural requirements. Considerable testimony was presented to the subcommittee that highly skilled and irreplaceable machinists, for example, were drafted without regard to their key positions in war production. Essential workers in agriculture as well as in industry have been withdrawn in the same unplanned way.

Your subcommittee approves the inclusion of Selective Service within the War Manpower Commission and declares emphatically that the centering of greater responsibility for occupational deferment policy in the State and national offices of Selective Service would constitute a backward step. The Selective Service hierarchy, including occupational advisers, above the local boards, is composed almost entirely of military men whose qualifications do not bear upon the job in hand. Unfortunately, proposals to give greater authority to the Selective Service System in the complex job of mobilizing manpower continue despite the clear mandate in the Executive order that qualified civilian personnel must perform the job. If these ill-considered proposals are acted upon, complete manpower chaos will follow.

Your subcommittee considers that the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission can give meaning to his new mandate only by the rapid, vigorous development of national and regional plans for the training and transfer of labor, and for a system of labor-utilization inspection to prevent hoarding of labor and to increase labor productivity. Testimony before the subcommittee indicates that the War Manpower Commission has hardly begun to establish the regional and area machinery necessary to operate an effective program of manpower mobilization. Unless the United States Employment Service is completely revamped and equipped with the necessary funds and personnel, the authority to channel workers through this service will come to naught.

While commending the principles contained in Executive Order 9279, and regarding the order as a forward step, your subcommittee is unanimous that it can be no substitute for the Office of War Mobilization embodied in S. 2871. Your subcommittee concurs with the judgment of the chairmen of five congressional committees that manpower mobilization must proceed as part of a centrally managed production whole, or else the mobilizing agency will have the strait-jacketed role of a referral agency to the largest war contractors. The Executive order says nothing about the role of the manpower chief in production policy. So long as the relationships and responsibilities between the military and civilian agencies in war production are not clearly defined, the authority of the manpower chief over the demand for manpower is nominal. Techniques for the training, transferring, and inspecting the use of manpower cannot become really effective without a rational program for scheduling the demand for this manpower.

The contribution of S. 2871 in part is to define (1) the relationships between military and civilian agencies for the whole war program and (2) the operating responsibilities within the civilian administration of the war program. The new executive order achieves neither of these fundamental necessities and therefore can be no substitute. To the extent that the new order confers added power as against the old one, it may cut even more across existing lines of responsibility. So while it is a step in the right direction, the goal of unified war production can be achieved only if other steps are taken simultaneously.

INTEGRATED PRODUCTION PLANNING

There are three alternatives before us: (1) Proper mobilization as represented in S. 2871, (2) continuance of the muddling through with the present dispersion of powers and lack of coordination, (3) centralization of control of the civilian economy under the military.

The attitude that we can somehow muddle through this war without proper organization is one which invites defeat. Our offensive warfare in north Africa has decreased the ranks of those who fail to recognize the need for total mobilization. This has, however, been offset by the tendency of some to believe that we can now rest on our oars, and that the battle has been already won.

Your subcommittee believes that the Axis enemy cannot be defeated by haphazard, partial use of our resources. We believe that the American people desire and are prepared for all necessary steps to mobilize our complete resources.

The job of the military is to defeat the enemy on the field of battle. Its experience, personnel, training, and viewpoint do not fit it for centralized production and procurement planning. We agree with the opinion of Mr. Bernard Baruch so ably expressed in a memorandum submitted to a joint congressional and Cabinet commission in 1931:

"It is absolutely impracticable for the War Department to control industrial mobilization because:

"(a) It is an economic problem requiring the ablest leadership in industry and utterly unsuited to military administration.

"(b) The central control agency must act as arbiter of conflicting demands—the greatest of which is that of the civilian population. No single competitor, such as the War Department, should be entrusted with such arbitration.

"(c) The job of the War Department is our armed forces. That is a big job. To pile on top of it the task of economic mobilization would insure the failure of both.

"There is an inevitable tendency in the War Department to forget these principles even in planning. Their function is to say what they want and when and where they want it. The job of industrial control is to see that they get it strictly on their specification. We must neither militarize industry nor industrialize the Army."

Full mobilization of our economy must rest in civilian hands. Manpower, contracts, facilities, scheduling, and raw materials are all related elements in war production. The proper decisions can be made and policies developed only when these elements are integrated into an over-all program. The Office of War Mobilization in the bill now before us would provide the instruments for achieving such a program. This bill, in effect, calls for an economic general staff in relation to the civilian war effort. It establishes a clear line of command from the President on down, just as for our military strategy there is a clear line of command from our Commander in Chief and the joint chiefs of staff to the specific military operations being undertaken in various parts of the world. We can no longer afford the peacetime luxury of overlapping, duplicating, and conflicting Federal agencies. We can no longer tolerate the disturbances to production created by lack of adequate authority and responsibility. It has become necessary to break cleanly with the present situation and to consolidate our war agencies into one smoothly functioning machine. Then only will maximum war production be obtained.

The proposed legislation will, we believe, make a major contribution to America's war effort by (1) locating final responsibility for policy-making decisions in one set of hands; (2) redefining the operating responsibilities of all subordinate agencies so as to minimize or to eliminate all current jurisdictional disputes; (3) decentralizing operating responsibility in regional and district offices; (4) providing the Director of War Mobilization and all his subordinates with a comprehensive information on current progress; (5) establishing for the first time adequate machinery to balance the requirements of the armed forces with the potential capacity of the American economy; (6) creating an advisory group broadly representative of the American productive economy to guide and assist the Director of War Mobilization on policy decisions.

1. The proposed legislation will locate final responsibility for policy-making decisions in one civilian head subject to approval by the President.

Unity of command and full information as to current developments are indispensable in wartime. In modern war it is as true for military production as it is for combat operation. But war production and other organized efforts to back up the fighting front must be directed by civilians.

Unified control over industrial and agricultural production, transportation, and essential civilian needs has been lacking to date.

No single individual and no group of individuals is to blame for this. It is attributable to the difficulties of converting our peacetime economy and governmental apparatus to the demands of modern war. Nevertheless, we cannot afford to continue longer in this fashion.

The people think there are too many agencies with overlapping responsibility. The people think there are too many jurisdictional disputes between these agencies. The people think too many operations are being carried on from Washington. The people persist in the belief that many of the tasks ahead are essentially simple if properly organized.

We believe that the people are right. This legislation, which we support, will stop the piling one agency on another. All future reorganizations will take place from the top down. Final decisions will rest with the Director of War Mobilization, subject, of course, to check by the President.

2. The proposed legislation will redefine the operating responsibilities of all agencies, to minimize or to eliminate all current jurisdictional disputes.

Testimony taken by this subcommittee indicates that unwarranted delays and failure to make decisions are more serious than actual errors in decisions by these agencies.

The resulting confusion has had an adverse effect on both the administrators and the public. At a time when action was of prime importance one operation after another was paralyzed for lack of decision.

Where mistakes have been made, they have frequently sprung from the absence of any over-all program. Lacking such a program and a central authority for integrating the several subordinate agencies, war production has stumbled from one crisis into another.

The continued existence of competing agencies defies the formulation of a program. The absence of a program, in turn, makes effective scheduling impossible. Manpower cannot be related to production or production to transportation.

To date the armed services and other contracting agencies have retained jurisdiction over procurement and production. Control over the flow of materials has been lodged in the hands of the War Production Board, but much of the responsibility for issuing priority orders until recently has been left with the armed services. Meanwhile, manpower functions have been dispersed among the War Department, the War Manpower Commission, the War Production Board in its various divisions, and the Selective Service Administration. Many other agencies and many divisions of the agencies mentioned have been operating in these fields without any clear definition of function and responsibility.

3. The proposed legislation will decentralize operating responsibility in regional and district offices.

Full knowledge of productive capacity currently available is to be had only at the local level. Here also the decisions must be made which achieve day to day balance in the production program. Until authority for contract letting and adjustment of manpower supply to demand is decentralized our war program will continue to lag.

This is well known to men experienced in production. They are optimistic about the achievements possible through genuine decentralization. Their optimism derives from experience.

A decentralized war production program will need to use more production engineers outside the individual plants in order that fewer may be needed inside those plants. Within a given firm every use of a production engineer for trouble shooting removes that man from the maintenance of a steady flow of production. Serious difficulties nowadays are most likely to appear several steps back in the flow of production and tend to involve many other producers. Proper scheduling will quickly show up such developing bottlenecks; the presence of a qualified man who can understand the trouble will release the energies of half a dozen firms.

This legislation establishes regional offices of the Office of War Mobilization, production and supply, manpower supply, economic stabilization, and technical mobilization. It also stipulates the formation of a regional board over which will preside a chairman who is the representative of the Director of War Mobilization. Thus, unified command extends from the national to the regional level and to the district level.

Once the proposed organization has been established the national offices will be concerned primarily with major policy and operating decisions. The existing war agencies have not functioned in this manner. Instead, they have constantly organized "rescue parties" to cope with problems which should have long been anticipated and planned for.

4. The proposed legislation will permit the Director of War Mobilization and his subordinates to obtain comprehensive information on current progress.

A committee on requirements and program is to be established to bring together representatives of the contracting agencies and the several offices attached to the Office of War Mobilization; the Director of War Mobilization is made chairman of the committee. Attached to this committee are to be a division of program planning and a division of progress reporting.

Before we can have effective program planning we need to improve the current system of progress reporting. And improvements in progress reporting depend upon effective scheduling.

To date what passes for scheduling among the armed services and other contracting agencies should properly be called forecasting. These forecasts have left much to be desired. Most of them have overshot the mark, but a few have fallen short by a wide margin. The production program has been bedeviled by overproduction of some items and some components while most items have been falling short of our goals and our needs. Many bottlenecks could have been prevented by a proper scheduling system.

5. The proposed legislation will establish for the first time adequate machinery for balancing the requirements of the armed forces with potential capacity of the American economy.

This is the job assigned to the Committee on Requirements and Program. As chairman of this committee, the Director of War Mobilization will secure from the armed services and other claimant agencies statements of their requirements. By the transfer of responsibility for letting contracts and their fulfillment to the Office of Production and Supply, the new plan leaves to the armed services and other claimant agencies the responsibility for stating their requirements and specifications. Because we are in a shortage situation, both requirements and specifications must be reviewed by the Committee on Requirements and Program and cut back to conform with the over-all program.

This proposal makes the Director of War Mobilization responsible for the establishment of a balanced war production program. Since the end result of this program is an effective American fighting machine, the purpose of creating such a committee is to bring into balance the existing program. It is not enough to allocate among the competing claimant agencies a fractional part of the materials they desire or to require them to adjust their individual programs to conform to the available supply of materials.

6. The proposed legislation will create an advisory group broadly representative of the American production economy through which the Director of War Mobilization can obtain guidance and assistance on policy decisions.

A Board of War Mobilization is to be established consisting of representatives of industry, labor, agriculture, and the general public. This Board is to be consulted on all major policy questions. It is not to be given veto power.

By this means it is hoped to give the Director access to representatives of the leading groups engaged in war production. If the Director knows that his actions will have the support of these leading groups represented on the Board, he can proceed quickly and with reasonable confidence of general support throughout the country.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, subsequently Senate bill 607, to which I have referred, was reintroduced at this session of the Congress, and was referred, by the wisdom of the Senate, to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. A very able subcommittee of that committee was appointed, under the chairmanship of the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE].

The members of that subcommittee are the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. WALLGREN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

That subcommittee, Mr. President, went most earnestly and seriously into this baffling question of how to get the best results out of American economy in the prosecution of the war, how to avoid the conflicts which were frustrating the national war effort, and how to resolve the clashes and controversies in furtherance of the war itself. Great credit goes to that subcommittee for its accomplishments.

That subcommittee, Mr. President, made a very able report to the Military Affairs Committee on the 13th of this month, in which a definite and concrete recommendation for setting up a war mobilization committee was made to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD at this point, as part of my remarks, the report from the Subcommittee on War Mobilization to which I have just adverted.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR MOBILIZATION—REPORT TO THE SENATE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE FROM THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON WAR MOBILIZATION

Mr. Chairman, we have the honor to submit this, the first interim report of this Committee on War Mobilization, in the interest of clarifying certain issues in war production which have become matters of foremost national concern. The committee, through enactment of Senate Resolutions 33 and 107 has been charged with the duty and responsibility of inquiring into the mobilization of the Nation's resources for war.

I

This first interim report is based on hearings held in executive session on April 16, 17, and 19 and on certain independent studies and investigations pursued by the committee. Testimony was given by Justice James F. Byrnes, Mr. Paul V. McNutt, and Mr. Charles E. Wilson with regard to the interrelation of the Office of Economic Stabilization, War Manpower Commission, and War Production Board. Questioning of the witnesses was directed principally toward section 3 of S. 607, a bill to establish an Office of War Mobilization. S. 607 was referred to this committee for study and consideration.

Section 3 reads as follows:

"There is hereby created a Committee on Requirements and Program under the chairmanship of the Director and consisting of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Administrators of the four constituent offices of the Office of War Mobilization. This Committee shall develop, subject to the approval of the President, a comprehensive national program for maximum use of resources for military and essential civilian needs. This program shall be based on schedules of military requirements furnished by the War and Navy Departments and determinations as to minimum essential civilian needs and available resources by the Office of War Mobilization."

It is evident that this section proposes the establishment of a program committee, in which is vested full authority, subject to the approval of the President, for establishing an over-all war-production program, and the powers to keep all parts of this program in balance.

Evidence studied by the committee shows urgent necessity for such action. The committee feels that these facts are of such compelling importance at this time that they should be released at once rather than at the termination of the committee's deliberations concerning S. 607.

The primary fact which we must record is that in many essential programs we are behind schedule. Several key programs have been materially reduced; among them aircraft, tanks, and ordnance.

In the opinion of this committee the principal cause for our failure to meet the President's production goals has been the lack of proper mobilization policies and the necessary war organization to execute those policies. Alleged material and manpower shortages are a result of these lacks.

In almost every phase of the war effort we have continued to rely upon customary practices and relationships. We have not as yet developed the unified policy and operational structure which is the basis of competent organization in Government as well as in business.

We are confronted by a deep-going crisis. Our various war programs, all essential, are out of balance with one another and in most cases are short of the goals set. We face the crucial months of the war with world-wide offensive action demanded of our armed forces. Yet in Washington there is much talk about cut-backs, of renewed production of civilian goods. Rather than every effort being bent toward perfecting war mobilization organization and policy, we find attention concentrated on how to avoid the inevitable changes in customary government and production practices and relationships which alone will release the mighty productive and manpower resources of the American Nation for an all-out war effort.

We find inadequate steel capacity with the result that one program must be sacrificed for another. We find that facilities have been overexpanded in certain industries, while small plants able to do the job have gone unused.

In brief, no over-all production program has existed or does now exist. Nor does any war agency exist, the responsibility of which is to balance and integrate the various but equally essential programs. While we have achieved much in war production, still for want of policy and organization we find ourselves falling short of all-out mobilization, short of the production needed for our fighting men.

S. 607 assumes particular timeliness in view of the current controversy raging over the needs of the rubber program versus the needs of the 100-octane program. Charges and countercharges by those engaged in this controversy show beyond question that each of the several major production programs was conducted independently of all others, that balance has not been maintained, and that almost every program is behind schedule.

There is nothing new in this, for the conflict between the needs of the rubber program, the 100-octane aviation gasoline program, and the naval escort vessel program has already been conducted in the national press at least three times within the past 6 months and many more times before congressional committees.

Several months ago, at the time of the Casablanca Conference, this particular conflict was reported to have been resolved. Now it flares again. It would seem that lack of balance in the war-production program is clearly exhibited by the recurrence of this old conflict. It is logical to assume that absence of a balanced program will continue to prevent achievement of our war production goals and will become the occasion for further cut-backs, unless and until some over-all balancing of the various programs is accomplished.

War necessarily dictates that manpower, facilities, materials, and every other resource in every field, all are the components in our war economy and must move together in balance to obtain maximum production. Every resource is essential and upon their proper joint scheduling rests the possibility of the success of our entire production program.

II

Common sense would seem to indicate that, with the life of the Nation and of the free world at stake, keymen who are responsible for the various parts of our war-production program must meet together regularly in order that fundamental production policy decisions may be reached on a joint basis and in an orderly fashion.

Perhaps the three most fundamental divisions of the war mobilization structure, insofar as production is concerned, are the Office of Economic Stabilization, the War Manpower Commission, and the War Production Board. The three witnesses, each representing one of these key agencies, agreed that their three programs are interdependent and interrelated. However, each testified that policy decisions in his particular agency are confined to the limits of authority delegated to that agency, and that such decisions are reached by the individual agencies on a unilateral basis.

Justice Byrnes, Mr. McNutt, and Mr. Wilson agreed that decisions of each have important bearing on the work of the other two. They testified that informal ad hoc interagency committees often meet on special problems, but the committee finds that no permanent over-all program committee exists.

In addition to informal interagency meetings, the witnesses pointed out that regular sessions of the Cabinet afford a formal mechanism whereby basic program and policy conflicts could be resolved.

The committee does not question the good will or competence of the Government officials responsible for various parts of the war-production program. The committee does not question the need for informal interagency committees and relationships, nor does it question the effective operation of the Cabinet system.

But the bald fact is that basic policy and program conflicts continue. Regardless of the particular effectiveness of the individual administrators, informal interagency meetings, and the functioning of the Cabinet, the committee is of the opinion that those officials directly and immediately responsible for the various critical war programs should establish joint policy and be jointly responsible for the smooth functioning of the war-production effort.

III

It would appear that the War Manpower Commission has been reduced virtually to the status of a service station, attempting to supply requirements as stated by a number of claimants. The agency exercises no control over the manpower demands of these claimants. The Chairman of the Commission testified that requirements of manpower for the armed forces are determined unilaterally by the War and Navy Departments. The Food Administrator determines manpower requirements in agriculture, and these are not reviewed by the War Manpower Commission. Demands of war contractors for manpower, according to the Chairman, are merely being checked on a statistical basis to determine whether original statements of needs conform with final hirings. There has been no practical control over the validity of demands by war contractors or to prevent hoarding, inefficient use of labor, unnecessary absenteeism, or labor idleness resulting from poor production methods and organization.

The evidence indicated that no machinery exists for balancing the demands of the various claimants in such a way as to preclude the possibility of any one program obtaining manpower at the expense of others.

Testimony showed that war production was being expanded or cut back in individual plants without consultation with the War Manpower Commission. Further, according to testimony, such expansions and cut-backs do not become known to the War Production Board until after they have taken place, and then in many cases by accident.

The War Manpower Chairman is without power to alter the demands placed upon the Commission. If he wishes to revise any demand placed upon War Manpower Commission, the Chairman must take up each question separately with the President. Such was the procedure in the determination of the size of the Army.

Recognizing that it has been excluded from the field of manpower demand, the War Manpower Commission has come to consider itself as a supply agency. However, the war contractors continue to hire through their own employment offices. Thus the War Manpower Commission has been excluded in most industrial areas from even its declared function as a supply agency.

There is only one activity left which the Manpower Commission can perform. That function is to freeze manpower on the job.

The War Manpower Commission has undertaken steps to freeze the supply of manpower. In the past 6 months it has established stabilization plans in certain areas which prevent a worker from leaving his present job unless the employer agrees to his separation, or unless the worker has obtained a "certificate of separation" from the local office of the United States Employment Service. By this arrangement, the employment service acts primarily as a court of appeals on the decision of the war contractor to hold the worker.

Under the Executive Order of April 8, the chairman of the War Manpower Commission has prohibited separation of an essential worker from his present employment if such separation has as its cause the inducement of higher wages. This action tends to freeze the supply of manpower into the present pattern of inefficiency.

IV

Testimony of the War Production Board vice chairman indicated that that agency also has been reduced virtually to the "service-station" status. Principal demands for facilities and raw materials represent unilateral decisions by claimant agencies and the War Production Board exercises no serious power of review. Unilateral determinations are made by the armed services, maritime and shipping agencies, the Food Administrator, the Rubber Director, and the Petroleum Administrator. Although the War Production Board allocates raw materials in bulk, it does not undertake to balance the fundamental elements of the production program. Likewise, it does not act to assure the most efficient utilization of facilities, raw materials, and other resources. In brief, there is a conspicuous absence of over-all balancing of programs that come within the purview of the War Production Board.

The Executive order establishing the War Production Board clearly intended to set up a central agency fully empowered to mobilize the Nation's resources for war. This was true to an even greater extent of the orders setting up the Supply Priorities and Allocations Board and the Office of Production Management, the latter of which included authority to mobilize manpower resources. It would appear, however, that most of these powers were delegated to the various agencies which now compete with one another in such a way as to engender conflicts inimical to maximum production.

Theoretically the War Production Board has general authority over contracts, use of facilities, materials allocation, and scheduling. In practice, these powers have been and are now exercised by the separate and competing procurement services to which they have been delegated.

Only in two particulars have the old relationships been altered by recent administrative changes. The War Production Board has undertaken to schedule the flow of critical components. Also, Mr. Charles E. Wilson is exerting very real pressure to improve inventory control and to improve scheduling of materials by the services.

In no single phase of the war-production program does centralized control exist at the present time. This is true of materials, distribution, scheduling, use of facilities, and contracting. In summary, the War Production Board is not a war-production board. It does not function as an over-all production organization.

V

There has been considerable discussion of the relationship of stabilization policies to the mobilization of manpower and production. In the Executive order of April 8, the Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization is instructed to 'hold the line." The President's veto of the Bankhead bill, the dismissal of 10,000 wage cases by the War Labor Board, the announcement by Price Administrator Prentiss Brown that no general rent increase would be granted, the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in rolling back freight rates—these and other steps would seem to indicate that the administration has decided to "hold the line" against inflation.

Within the "hold-the-line" framework, the Executive order of April 8, in sections 1, 2, and 5 authorizes the Director of the Office of Economic Stabilization to alter relative prices and wages in order "to maintain and increase production." However, so far as the committee could discover, there is at the present time no comprehension of the need for a flexible wage and price policy within the general price and wage levels in order to "maintain and increase production."

Indeed, there is little understanding of the complete interdependence of stabilization, manpower, and production policies. Nor does there exist at the present time any mechanism to provide for policy decisions which concern all three aspects of the war-production effort.

Failure to understand the interdependence of wage and price policies with the mobilization of production facilities and manpower is reflected in the changing wage and price policy decisions.

The Shipbuilding Stabilization Agreement endorsed by the War Labor Board created a liberal wage scale in order to flow manpower into this war industry.

In the Non-Ferrous Metal Mining case, wage and price decisions were made a part of a complex manpower and production policy.

But in the Packing case, in the West Coast Air Frame case, and in other cases, wage decisions have attempted to sidestep the manpower problem. And the Executive order of April 8 serves to freeze wage inequalities which hinder manpower mobilization.

Because the War Manpower Commission has failed to fulfill its function as a supply agency, prime contractors have relied upon wage increases to hold or obtain needed manpower. Seventy-five to eighty-five percent of all wage cases before the War Labor Board have represented requests by employers to raise wages for manpower reasons.

Because wages and prices have not been considered as production questions, our price and wage policies have been piecemeal, depending in many cases upon considerations peculiar to the specific case.

If wages and prices had been administered as production and manpower instruments, stabilization of both the wage and price structure by industry-wide agreements, with incentive payments for increased production, would have become the basis for policy at an early stage.

Only if wages and prices become production instruments will it be possible to achieve overall stabilization of the economy.

In the case of armament production a serious error has been made by not giving enough recognition to the close relation of prices to production. Under the present cost-plus system there are no incentives for efficient use of facilities, labor, and materials. The cost-plus system, combined with the lack of production controls, constitutes the root of a tremendous waste of resources and inflationary tendencies.

Justice Byrnes testified that his function as Director of Economic Stabilization primarily is one of settling disputes. He described his function as that of a "court of appeals." His agency has chosen to limit itself to curative rather than preventive action. No problem is considered by the Office of Economic Stabilization until it has reached an impasse through controversy among subordinate agencies.

It is clear that the Office of Economic Stabilization does not operate as an over-all agency to balance the various war-production and mobilization programs.

VI

The three witnesses described advisory boards which now exist for the purpose of discussing policy on a joint basis. Each of these boards is attached to one or the other of the three major agencies—Office of Economic Stabilization, War Manpower Commission, and War Production Board. Top officials of related agencies are included in the membership. But no one of these existing advisory boards has the authority to function as an over-all mobilization organization. They have never served in such a capacity, with the result that important decisions have always been made on a unilateral basis by the agency having jurisdiction over the program in question.

For example, when questioned on policy determinations in the drafting of fathers for military service, testimony of the three witnesses indicated that no joint decision was reached in the matter. Drafting of fathers, according to the testimony, has been treated purely as a manpower problem within the narrow jurisdiction of the War Manpower Commission. The testimony revealed that the effect of the drafting of fathers on war production was not considered, or at least that the War Production Board was not consulted in this connection. The effect of this action on the national economy in removing principal income sources from large groups of families has not been considered by the economic stabilization agency.

Similarly, the whole question of the size of the Army and the use of manpower in general has been decided on a narrow agency basis after unilateral decisions on requirements by the armed services. In no instance was a joint policy decision reached by representatives of all affected agencies.

The committee also discussed incentive wages with the three witnesses. It appears that decisions are to be made by one agency, this time by the War Production Board, although the problem is common to all agencies.

The poor results in aircraft production by the Ford Willow Run plant were discussed with the three witnesses. It was agreed that this specific problem involved questions of manpower, production, and economic stabilization. Yet it has been treated purely as a War Production Board problem and no attempt has been made to reach a joint agreement on action needed.

In the case of the airplane industry as a whole, it has been estimated that the present program requires 750,000 additional workers by the end of 1943. However, it appears that existing and even higher production commitments could be met with one-half or one-third of the additional workers if steps were taken to obtain the most efficient utilization of manpower already on the job.

But the aircraft agencies of the Federal Government do not appear to be taking the steps necessary for making these substantial reductions in manpower requirements. Undoubtedly this situation is duplicated in the shipbuilding program and other major production programs.

Thus, each particular production program may be using 20 to 100 percent more manpower than it actually needs. Under the present hit-and-miss system not only are excessive requests for manpower being made, and no controls imposed to obtain efficient use of labor, but production goals are being cut back because steps necessary for efficiency have not been introduced. The President's aircraft program of 125,000 planes for 1943 has already been cut below 100,000 planes.

VII

It is with regret that the committee is compelled to report that war mobilization is in crisis. Either we go forward to undertake the integration of basic mobilization policies in the fields of manpower, production, and stabilization, or we will continue to proceed haltingly from one emergency to another.

The time has come—indeed, it has all but passed—for basic policy integration. We cannot accept the doctrine that we are in the middle of a war and therefore cannot undertake to effect total mobilization. That is a doctrine of despair. It must be discarded if we are to forge ahead to victory.

The committee will continue its hearings on S. 607 in order to study completely the existing war organization and its effect on the mobilization of the Nation's resources in America's battle for survival.

VIII

We recommend that the Senate Military Affairs Committee report a revised version of section 3 of S. 607 to the floor of the Senate as a separate bill. The following is the wording of the recommended bill:

"A bill to create a Board charged with the duty of formulating a war mobilization program, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc.,

"SECTION 1. Board established: (a) There is hereby created a War Mobilization Board. The Board shall have a membership of 13, being comprised of a Chairman, to be appointed by the President, to be paid a salary of $10,000, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Navy, the Chief of Staff of the Army, the Chief of Naval Operations, the Lend-Lease Administrator, the Chairman of the War Production Board, the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, the War Food Administrator, the Petroleum Administrator for War (serving also for the Solid Fuels Administration), the Administrator of the War Shipping Administration (serving also for the Maritime Commission), the Director of the Office of Defense Transportation, and the Director of Economic Stabilization.

"(b) In the event any of the offices named in paragraph (a) of this section shall be combined, abolished, or otherwise reorganized the President shall make such changes in the personnel of the Board as he shall deem appropriate.

"SEC. 2. Duties of the Board: The Board shall:

"(a) Formulate and submit to the President for approval, after consultation with such other Federal officials as it deems necessary, a comprehensive war mobilization program for mobilization and maximum utilization of the Nation's resources for the supply of military forces and essential civilian need. As part of the war mobilization program, the Board shall provide for stabilization and adjustment of the national economy in accordance with the needs of full mobilization. The war mobilization program shall include a detailed schedule of military and essential civilian production and specific quotas of manpower and allocation of other resources, including facilities and materials, to be made available to the military forces, to particular categories of military and civilian production, and to other productive and economic activity. In preparing the war mobilization program the Board shall take into account schedules of requirements and available resources furnished by the appropriate agencies of the Federal Government.

"(b) In order to effectuate the war mobilization program, the Chairman of the Board, with the approval of a majority of the Board, shall have the power, within the limits and authority vested in the executive departments and agencies concerned with the subject matter under consideration, to issue directives on policies, plans, procedures, and methods to such departments and agencies, and to order any executive department or agency to utilize its facilities, services, and personnel and to take such action under the authority vested in it as the Chairman, with the approval of a majority of the Board, deems necessary.

"It shall be the duty of the departments and agencies of the Federal Government to comply with these directives and orders."

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, Senate bill 607, to which I have adverted, and which I have asked to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, was introduced in the Senate by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. President, we recall that as early as May 1940, when it became apparent that the resources at least of this nation had to be mobilized into an arsenal of democracy if democracy were to be saved in the world, the President set up the National Defense Advisory Committee. That committee was succeeded in January 1941 by the Office of Production Management. The process of evolution continued and in September 1941, the Supply, Priorities, and Allocations Board was created by Executive order. The situation demanded further alteration and change, so that at last in January 1942, by Executive order, the War Production Board was created, and there was appointed a chairman of the War Production Board. That board continued to function until the summer of 1942, with a very considerable lack of decisiveness in its policy and a lack of adequacy in the performance of the obligations imposed upon it by the President's Executive order of January 1942.

Finally, Mr. Donald Nelson, the Chairman of the War Production Board, brought to his aid—I believe it is correct to say with the assistance of representatives of the War Department and the Navy Department—one of the able men of this country, Mr. Charles Wilson, the head of General Electric Co., which has a fine production record during the war, and Mr. Wilson has made a signal contribution to the war effort by the way that he, with relatively limited powers, has improved the correlation and coordination and the concert of effort among the various agencies producing, distributing, and transporting for war.

But it was obvious, Mr. President, that there was still no authority in any person other than in the President himself to pull the heads of these various departments together and demand that they pull like a team for the nation, and not for their own departments or agencies. Instance after instance occurred wherein the national effort was either paralyzed, or frustrated, or at least delayed, by lack of cooperation and coordination on the part of the executive agencies who should have been a team, but in many instances were a galaxy of prima donnas.

So at last the President in the spirit of the effort of the Congress and in furtherance thereof, has finally vested in Mr. Justice James F. Byrnes the authority to correlate and coordinate and to put into concert the efforts of the various Federal agencies, so that at last they will be a mighty team pulling a mighty nation to a glorious victory.

Mr. Byrnes' powers, Mr. President, are very great under this Executive order. Most of us would have preferred perhaps that the authority be set up by the Congress, but those of us who have been the sponsors of this legislation are concerned about results and not honors and not even technique. The nation is concerned about getting the job done.

But we do have a right to look with peculiar interest and attention upon the administration of this Executive order by its able director, Mr. Justice James F. Byrnes. Mr. Byrnes has authority, not only to pull into consultation and counsel the various Federal agencies, but it is their duty to obey his directives in furtherance of the national economic effort. Of course, Mr. Byrnes does not have authority over the military or the naval operations of the Nation, but he does have authority, as this Executive order says—

> To unify the activities of Federal agencies and departments engaged in or concerned with production, procurement, distribution, or transportation of military or civilian supplies, materials, and products and to resolve and determine controversies between such agencies or departments.

With a single unimportant exception.

I know I express the hope of many Senators, Mr. President, when I say that I am entertaining the belief that Mr. Justice Byrnes will carry this principle of correlation and coordination out of Washington into the field itself, into the various regions of the Nation, even into the several States, and, if need be, even into the vital producing areas of the Nation, for these levels of coordination must occur throughout the whole effort or the effort will be frustrated and impaired.

I rather regret that the President did not see fit to have added into his Executive order the duty of the Director to take into consultation representatives of management, of labor, of agriculture, and of the public, so that there might have been brought to bear upon the Executive director the greatest possible wisdom from the country, but knowing as I do, and as Senators do, Mr. President, the character and the open-mindedness and the anxiety of Mr. Justice Byrnes always to avail himself of the best of counsel and knowledge, I am assured in my own mind that he will always be accessible to these groups and that he will call them into counsel whenever occasion may require.

Mr. President, in Washington is, or has recently been, the Prime Minister of Great Britain. The President and the Prime Minister, with the technical staffs, have been in consultation about making and launching the final offensive upon which we rely to bring the evil Axis to its knees, to bring at last its leaders to the hangman's noose. That cannot be accomplished, Mr. President, within our mighty potential, unless it be totally employed, unless the whole weight of our strength be thrown against the enemy in proper timing and concert with our allies. Now at last there is a member of this War Mobilization Committee, the head of the Munitions Assignment Board, who acts in concert with our allies all over the world. I am led to believe, therefore, that our leaders have been thinking in terms, not only of coordinating our domestic effort, but of bringing into accord our struggles all around the world among the members of the United Nations. That is a good sign. Democracy is at last working effectively.

So I compliment the President, if I am not puny in doing so, upon drawing tighter the lines of control of our effort, and directing it with greater energy and clarity against the enemy. I hope, therefore, that we will hear no more of these clashes and conflicts of Federal agencies and officials; that at last we will recognize that there is someone to whom we may appeal other than the busy President, to bring us out of too frequent chaos, and to expedite the happy day of victory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I notice that under the President's order a board composed of five men, in addition to the chairman of the board, is set up. Is it the Senator's understanding that votes will be taken by the board on the questions pending before it? In other words, what I fear is that perhaps through the new arrangement the War Production Board and the men responsible for its operation and functioning will completely lose their authority and their power to do their jobs, because they have been placed as a minority in the executive board. What is the Senator's opinion on that point?

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the able Senator, who has been most helpful in the whole effort to get something like this into reality, for his question and suggestion. If I thought that the development anticipated or feared by the able Senator would occur I, too, would be alarmed, because I think it would be contrary to the national interest.

However, Mr. President, with the War Production Board being executively administered by an able man like Mr. Charles Wilson, who has already done a marvelous job of administration, who knows production from first-hand and from long experience, and who knows how to get a job done, I am sure that Mr. Justice Byrnes is too wise a man to interfere with the authority of so able a man as Mr. Charles Wilson, in his sphere of operations.

However, Mr. President, I conceive that Mr. Justice Byrnes' function will be more nearly to coordinate the efforts and activities of all Federal agencies, and to stimulate the one and retard the other, when occasion might demand, to initiate suggestions which might improve the whole effort and better the whole pattern, and more or less to be the captain of the team or the director of all the various organizations, so that he might get the best out of them all, and keep them in balance and in equilibrium.

For example, if Mr. Justice Byrnes were to discover that it was essential in the national effort to have better cooperation among the procurement agencies, he would not have the Maritime Commission pulling in one direction with a policy, and the Army and Navy pulling in still another direction, or in two directions—which is more likely to be the case—and other agencies doing something else. I anticipate seeing the day come when such a man as Mr. Justice Byrnes will have the representatives of all the procurement agencies of the Government seated around a table, and then will have there the representatives of the War Manpower Commission, the representatives of the War Production Board, and the representatives of all the other agencies which must act in concert in order to get the job done. Then they will operate in concert and will exchange their views, and Mr. Justice Byrnes will make the decisions and will get the right men in the right places, and eventually will get the whole machine going in the right direction.

Mr. President, I am sure it is in the mind of every member of the Senate that recently we had quite a controversy here about who retarded the octane-gas program, the synthetic-rubber program, and the escort-vessel program. It was generally agreed that the thing which retarded the development of those programs was the shortage of valves. As luck would have it, a few days ago when I was coming from Florida on an airplane I found myself seated beside the head of a valve-manufacturing enterprise in the South. With this controversy fresh in my mind, upon learning that he was a valve manufacturer, we got talking on the subject of the production of valves, and I led the discussion into an inquiry of him as to how there came to be a shortage of valves for those three programs. He says the reason was that when the valve manufacturers came to Washington to find out how many valves were needed, they could not find anyone who knew. They were told that more valve-producing facilities would be needed. But they could not find anyone who would tell them how many valves would be needed. They could not find anyone who would standardize the valves that the industry was making. On the contrary, some of the agencies wanted them to make literally thousands of modifications in standardized valves which could be produced in large volume.

It was only after all the programs had been laid out—after the decisions had been made as to the number of ships, the quantity of octane gasoline, and the volume of synthetic rubber needed—and after the production on all of them was under way, that it was at last discovered that there was a shortage of valves and a shortage of facilities with which to produce them. That situation came about because there was no coordination of the whole effort. The Nation is not just making synthetic rubber or octane gasoline or escort vessels. The United States of America is at war, and our great task is in getting the United States Government to run the war, and not having a lot of separate, often unrelated, and occasionally antagonistic agencies trying to run the war.

At last, therefore, to aid the overburdened President there is a capable man with knowledge of how to get things done by and through people, a man who has the opportunity to strengthen and to accelerate the tremendous effort which now is being turned in its forward assault upon the cracking Axis.

Therefore, Mr. President, I wanted to say a word in commendation to those in Congress and to the President for this forward step toward winning the war.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1932, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session since 11 o'clock, and it is now almost 5:30. It is obvious that we cannot today conclude the debate and reach a vote on the committee amendment—the Danaher amendment. Therefore, I submit the unanimous-consent request which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The request will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that at the conclusion of its proceedings today the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday next; that at not later than 2:30 o'clock p. m. on said day a vote be had without further debate on the committee amendment to the joint resolution under consideration, viz, House Joint Resolution 111, the time between the hours of 11 o'clock a. m. and 2:30 p. m. to be equally divided between the proponents and opponents of the amendment, to be controlled respectively by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate proceed to consider executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAVEZ in the chair) laid before the Senate messages fr m the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations was submitted:

By Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance:

Several surgeons and passed assistant surgeons for temporary promotion in the United States Public Health Service.

By Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Military Affairs:

Sundry officers for appointment and/or promotion, and also appointment, by transfer, all in the Regular Army; and Sundry citizens for appointment under the War Manpower Commission.

By Mr. MCKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Sundry postmasters.

BRIG. GEN. NORMAN THOMAS KIRK—NOMINATION REPORTED AND CONFIRMED

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs, I report favorably the nomination of Brig. Gen. Norman Thomas Kirk to be Surgeon General in the Army of the United States, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I have consulted with my good friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] and with other Senators; and if there is no objection, I should like to have the nomination considered and confirmed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I understand that the committee reported the nomination unanimously. I believe that the change must be made by Tuesday.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is correct.

Mr. MCNARY. Under the circumstances, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be read.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Brig. Gen. Norman Thomas Kirk (colonel, Medical Corps), Army of the United States, for appointment in the Regular Army of the United States as the surgeon general, with the rank of major general, for a period of 4 years from date of acceptance, vice Maj. Gen. James C. Magee, the Surgeon General, whose term of office expires May 31, 1943.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

APPOINTMENTS AND TRANSFERS IN THE REGULAR ARMY

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, there are divers other nominations for appointments and promotions, and also appointments, by transfer, all in the Regular Army, including 214 captains to be majors, 295 first lieutenants to be captains, 431 second lieutenants to be first lieutenants, and a few other nominations for appointments or promotions, or appointments by transfer. The printing in the RECORD of all the nominations would require considerable space. The nominations have been unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. I have consulted with the Senator from Oregon and with other Senators; and, if there is no objection, I should like to have the nominations confirmed en bloc at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, before the confirmation occurs, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask the able Senator if he has any knowledge as to how many of the officers whose nominations are now being considered are members of the National Guard or the Officers' Reserve.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are all in the Regular Army.

Mr. PEPPER. Is it not true with respect to the nominations for promotion which are submitted to the Senate that they are all nominations of Regular Army men?

Mr. CHANDLER. There are more Regular Army men than others, but there are promotions in the National Guard. However, it so happens that these are all Regular Army men.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is not customary to have the Senate confirm the appointments of any of the officers in the National Guard, the R. O. T. C., or the Army of the United States, below the rank of colonel.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. AUSTIN. Or perhaps not even of colonels. I think a man must have arrived at the rank above colonel in order that his nomination may be submitted to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Vermont is correct. That may account for the fact that there are fewer nominations for promotion in the National Guard than in the Regular Army.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, this is the second time I have made inquiry into this question. I have been somewhat disturbed by what appeared to me to be a policy on the part of the War Department to permit Reserve officers and National Guard officers to reach a certain rank and then stop. Very few of them get beyond the rank of colonel. Very few of them ever become brigadier generals or major generals. I have always thought that such a policy should be very carefully scrutinized, because there are some very able men in the National Guard and in the Officers' Reserve. I believe that sometimes they do not have perhaps as good an opportunity for promotion as do Regular Army officers.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Florida that his interest is shared by members of the Military Affairs Committee, and rather close attention is being given to the question which the Senator raises.

Mr. PEPPER. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has not been overlooked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the President be immediately notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

The clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the executive calendar.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Basil Manly to be a member of the Federal Power Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Wirt G. Bowman to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 26, with headquarters at Nogales, Ariz.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I am well acquainted with Mr. Bowman. He is a man of ability, and one of the outstanding businessmen of my State. He is well qualified in every way for this position, and will serve with credit to himself and his Government.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I understand that Mr. Bowman has been endorsed by both the senior and junior Senators from Arizona.

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of this nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

THE NAVY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William A. Glassford, Jr., to be vice admiral in the Navy, for temporary service, to rank from May 19, 1943.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Raymond A. Spruance to be vice admiral in the Navy, for temporary service, to rank from May 15, 1943.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Wilder DuP. Baker to be rear admiral in the Navy for temporary service, to rank from July 13, 1942.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the President be immediately notified of all nominations confirmed today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS TO TUESDAY

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before the Senate, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess, the recess being under the order previously entered, until Tuesday, June 1, 1943, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 28 (legislative day of May 24), 1943:

WAR MANPOWER COMMISSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 28, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Breathe upon us, O breath of God, as we wait in prayer at Thy holy altar. Like blossoms which open in the springtime revealing hidden beauty and wonder, so doth Thy plans unfold. Put Thy hand, O Lord, upon the life and destiny of our democracy and may the cross of our Master turn the hearts of men, blessing the sentiments and emotions unexpressed and unuttered.

Thou hast been unto us in the past, so wilt Thou be with us in the day that now is and the morrow which is to come. Beset by many problems and difficulties, inspire us with broad vision and sincere purpose; help us to take our part and assume our responsibilities. Almighty God, bless the Congress most abundantly; keep us as true as daylight, as sincere as Nature, and as open as divine mercy. O unify us and put us in league with the giant cause of humanity and idealism; with an uncompromising spirit keep us as constant as the breath of heaven. Lead us in the highest accomplishments of free government; uncoil the very best powers within us that men everywhere may feel their tremendous forces. Subdue extravagance, make the indifferent mind to think soberly; in city, in the quiet paths of the country, and by the high-sounding sea, lift all grateful hearts to Thee. Hold us all to the sublime assurance that the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

R. 2346) entitled "An act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes."

PRESIDENT OF BOLIVIA

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSTON, TEX., May 21, 1943.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

GEN. ENRIQUE PENARANDA,
President of Bolivia.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DILWEG] may be permitted to extend his own remarks in the RECORD and include therein the results of a recent telegraphic poll conducted by Esquire on the proposal that a three-man commission be appointed to represent sports during the war.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANASCO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INFLATIONARY THREAT

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the threat of price inflation continues to grow. Through the O. W. I. Discussion Guide No. 4 the Treasury Department has issued an appeal for public support for a spendings tax as a major means of mopping up inflationary income. The Senate Finance Committee turned a cold shoulder to that plan last summer; the House Ways and Means Committee will turn a cold shoulder to it this summer for the simple reason the proposal is grossly discriminatory. Everyone now knows that the bulk of the inflationary spending is in new war wages, the average of which is about $2,400 per year. But in advocating a spendings tax, the Treasury Department wants the Congress to exempt approximately $1,500 for a single man and $2,200 for a married man without dependents and more if he has dependents.

Recently the President made a fine and inspiring speech on the subject of holding the line against inflationary wage increases. His special committee to consider a demand for railroad workers has breached that line. His War Labor Board in virtually ordering the coal operators to agree to portal-to-portal pay, which for large operations will mean a daily increase of $1.50 in current wages, has breached it in a major way. The 80 cents per day the coal operators have agreed to pay violates the Little Steel formula, but John L. Lewis says: "Not enough."

The War Labor Board, in attempting to force the coal operators to agree to a wage scale, which in normal times would mean bankruptcy for them in the absence of a law enabling them to pass the burden on to the consumer, is evidently acting upon the assumption the Congress will provide such a law. My advice to the coal operators is to stop, look, and listen, else they may wake up one hot summer day in the near future to find they have been left holding the bag. Partial success for the increased wage demands of the coal miners is now assured. Yet the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. are merely waiting to ascertain the definite measure of that success before pressing their new wage demands. After yielding to the coal miners, the War Labor Board will have a fat chance to deny the future demands of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. Then we will see new life breathed into the Bankhead and Pace farm-price bills still pending in the Senate. It all adds up to price inflation of a very dangerous character.

LABOR

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my remarks today in the interest of labor, the laboring man and the laboring woman, of the group that is not organized but in numbers is seven to one in the majority. We do not maintain a dues-paying system, nor do we assess any of our members for the right to work, especially for our Government. We are the farmers, the lumberjacks, the cattlemen, the timber workers, the cowboys, the store and bank clerks, the small businessmen that are being discriminated against in favor of the chain stores; men on public works, men who make contribution to the erection of church houses and contribute to the Christian welfare of our respective communities. We are the majority of the people of America but we are not organized nor are we given too much consideration in the management of our Government or in the management of our own affairs.

From our homes and firesides our sons and daughters are now on every battle front in the world fighting for freedom, giving their all. We keenly feel that we should assert ourselves in this great world conflict in opposing a few small minority groups that are detrimental to our all-out efforts toward victory. We do not have a legal right to demand nor do we feel that we would be patriotic citizens were we given the right to strike, slow down, or demand higher wages in winning this World War.

We farmers are having a tough time. Our Government puts a ceiling upon our products, and a small organized group who profess to be very efficient claim our prices must be set back to a lower level. They suggest the Government subsidize us to keep the cost of living down. We know transportation and distribution increase the price of the toll to where it appears to be high, yet when the organized groups and the transportation companies get their demands, which are upheld by law, the consumer is paying the organized groups in many instances many multipled times the cost of production, in some instances more than we pay hijacking union-not-needed truck drivers.

To illustrate, when we reach a certain point going to market we are compelled to pay, regardless of whether any work is done or not, an exorbitant fee, in some instances more than our own cargo will bring on the market, for an organized member of a union to drive our truck to the market place, and, too, our court of last resort says these practices are in keeping with the laws of the land. Notwithstanding the lower House of Congress has passed a measure that is now on the Senate side, no action has been taken to correct this evil.

On last Sunday afternoon, between the hours of 1:15 and 1:30, I was listening to my radio, and I listened with a great deal of attention to the address of William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. In following his speech I made up my mind that somebody should bring it to the the attention of this body when he got to this point:

> The American Federation of Labor calls upon Congress to defeat the Smith-Connally bill. We will demand a record vote on this measure. Regardless of whether it is killed or adopted, we shall endeavor to vote out of office any Member of Congress who supports it. Into this effort the American Federation of Labor will pour every resource at its command.

Is not that cracking the whip? Is not that serving notice on you whether or not you will serve the people of America another term, particularly for me? I came to this Congress without the consent of organized labor. The American Federation of Labor endorsed my predecessor. Mr. Charles Hathaway, president of the Oklahoma State Federation of Labor, started off in this style:

There is important business at hand—the business of defeating PAUL STEWART, who is running for Congress in the Third District against Wilburn Cartwright, the incumbent.

Down farther in his letter he says:

I am asking you to send me a contribution for this "Beat Stewart" campaign if it is at all possible, and I am sure in most instances it is. It is up to you and me as union members to make believers out of these labor haters.

My labor record has not been bad from the viewpoint of organized labor. It is far above the average for the unorganized groups.

We are not given over to the theory of following the lines of least resistance for self-preservation. This is no time for complacency. To do what is right is our watchword. We shall not be intimidated regardless of the opinion of others. The American people have always on all occasions righted gross wrong, and, believe me you, they will rally to right present-day practices. We shall not withhold any action which enures to the betterment of our armed forces and the great mass of unorganized labor who are giving their all and putting forth their sincere energies and efforts to a supreme sacrifice for freedom and democracy. We know our Oklahoma and we will meet the adversary face to face and test the strength of our now overlords in that fair State. We believe the rank and file of organized labor see with us in our views upon fair play. We know too well many dues-paying members are counted as members that fully appreciate that when their country is at war they should not be compelled to pay a labor racketeer tribute of any amount in the way of a fee to work upon a Government project, and when the smoke clears away he will resume his normal life of continuing to be a red-blooded American citizen, and longs for that day.

I was amused the other day when we were discussing the poll-tax bill. I thought of the four great freedoms, and particularly of the freedom to work. Then I thought of some of my colleagues who were leading the fight and were so interested in their fellowman, and wondered how with a clear conscience they could support an organization that compels a man to pay for the privilege of working and then oppose a law which provides a citizen shall pay $2 fee to vote.

The groups of labor that I represent are not influential enough to have a round robin signed by Cabinet members and Under Secretaries and addressed to a legislative body in filing their protest against certain measures.

I was a little fearful when I first came here. I had always been taught that when you run counter to a statute in the United States Code it is dangerous. But after having been here 5 months, I see in places they do not care to jot their signature down in filing their protests to Congress. We do not have paid attorneys to represent us in the Halls of Congress. Occasionally one of us of the common herd will come up here as a Member and be faithful to a trust. I would be derelict and not keeping faith were I to let pass this challenge to the American people and their representatives in Congress.

I do not believe that Mr. Green's percentage in the Seventy-ninth Congress will be 20 percent of what it is today, and I do not mean by that there is going to be a turn-over; I believe that the people of the country have let and will let their wants be known, and that Congress will carry out their will.

There are some groups that are not too well organized, I mean upon point of strategy and a point of attack. This is another branch of the American Federation of Labor—the American Federation of Government Employees. This letter is out of the regional office over at Kansas City and is from Mr. Zimmerman, national vice president, ninth civil-service district.

He says in his letter to me of April 28, reading from the last paragraph:

There are several local posts of civil-service employees who are members of the American Federation of Government Employees living in your district. We will certainly remember those who prove to be our friends, also those who do not.

I have a like letter, worded a little differently but having the same meaning, from the president and secretary of Local 47, from Muskogee, Okla., and his concluding paragraph is as follows:

You are no doubt aware of the increase in the cost of living and the need for increase in salaries for Federal employees, and you are assured that your support will be appreciated and remembered.

I could well take my text from the 15th verse of the 24th chapter of Joshua: "Choose you this day whom ye will serve," for, after all, the issues uttermost in the minds of men of America is whether John L. Lewis and William Green and Philip Murray shall run this country or shall the great mass, we the people. I wager my possibilities and potentialities in further service of my people in Congress or otherwise that the majority will win and that those self-same organized-labor leaders will at some future date realize their mistake.

I am not a prophet, but these high-dealing organized-labor leaders will realize when Congress is made up of those now on the firing line their mistakes. Let me suggest that you make research, and read the story of the old beggar who could have become very rich had it not been for his greed for more. The story is substantially as follows: A great philanthropist came along with a cornucopia well filled with gold and forewarned an anxious old beggar, who was holding his hat as a container for the flowing gold therefrom—that should his hat—the container, spring a leak that all gold that went to the ground would become as naught, but with avarice the beggar pleaded for just a few more pieces which came forth and the hat burst and the gold became nil. Such will be the greed of the strangle hold of organized labor unless they relent their present hold upon the American public.

We think we know the pulse of Congress, I may be in error, but to my way of thinking, already many of you have voted at least one time against the wishes of the labor dictators and if so, you might as well have voted against every measure in Congress in which they were interested. Insofar as concerns political support, this group during my 20 years as a lawmaker have adhered to the old English proverb that goes back to 1545 that "One had as good eat of the devil as the broth he is boiled in."

I have given you now a rather brief history of the demands of organized labor and the threats of organized labor.

I want now to go into another field of action for a few short minutes, and that is the field of the fellow back home and on the battlefront. I received the other day a letter from an American patriot who is stationed in the southwest Pacific war zone, Island X. His letter is dated May 11, 1943, passed by the naval censor, addressed to the gentleman from Oklahoma, Hon. PAUL STEWART, M. C., House Office Building, Washington, D. C., and it is as follows:

DEAR MR. STEWART: You will be surprised to hear from one of your constituents out in this neck of the world, but using a voter's privilege, I am writing to you so that you may know the reaction of thousands of men out here in the service to the coal strike for higher wages. If you and enough like you were to order a battalion from here to attend to that little matter the strike would end and those un-American ——— would be taught what a sacrifice in the interest of a national effort means. They should be placed on the same pay basis we are and even then they have the comfort and conveniences of home and get to be with their loved ones. They don't fight the heat or cold, disease, and tropical fevers, vermin and ants, lizards, etc., that makes life very unpleasant for us to say the least, and these things are all in addition to our risking all for the privilege of living as we wish to. We are not making these sacrifices in order that such selfish un-American ——— can fatten their pocketbooks at the public expense. It looks from here as though there was a lack of guts in dealing with such scum. Give them ——— for us, Paul. I have told lots of my buddies of your fight for fairness and when I told them I was writing to you they heartily endorsed all I have said. If men of your courage do not fight for us and expose all of the rottenness of that mess that stinks clear out here, we just as well quit and come home. I am in the CB's construction unit of the Navy. Am from Broken Bow and know lots of your friends there and in Idabel. As a veteran of World War No. 1 and being in this one I know I am subject to disciplinary action for writing to an official criticizing the war efforts, but to ——— with consequences. You may keep my identify or use it, I care not, but do wish you to use this letter where it may do some good.

The slacker ——— are not content to stay safely at home but must highjack the war effort of our Nation to further their own selfish aims. John L. Lewis should be shot as a traitor or locked up in solitary from now on.

Hoping to hear from you and to hear of your action which we are sure you will take, I and my buddies are,

Respectfully,

The censor agrees.

I have the original letter in my office; I have sent for it now, and I shall be glad to show it to any Member of Congress here on the floor, and they can see the signature, which I will withhold. I might say that there was added these words on the last page of the letter, "The censor agrees."

I refer now to a like letter which is contained in the RECORD, in the Appendix, introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas, Congressman GATHINGS, and if Members will do so, they may turn to page A2579 of the Appendix and find it. That letter does not withhold the name, as I have in the case of my letter. He sets forth in no uncertain terms the condition as he sees it about these strikes, the sit-downs, and the unreasonable organized labor demands being made upon the American people in this distressful time.

As to the sentiment of the country, I have here a letter from Modern Industry, a magazine of and for all industry, 347 Madison Avenue, New York, and it is dated May 11, 1943, and says:

Should labor unions and trade organizations be required to register and file financial statements? Industry says "Yes." Voting by Modern Industry's readers, representing the 500,000 management men in 31,500 plants responsible for 89 percent of all United States production, was as follows:

"Yes," 96.9 percent.

"No," 3.1 percent.

These votes were cast after reading the arguments on both sides of the question as presented in Modern Industry's regular monthly feature, The Debate in Print.

Favoring the move was HOWARD W. SMITH of Virginia, while Leo Pressman, general counsel of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, argued against it. General feeling seems to be that legitimate organization would have nothing to fear from the searchlight of publicity, while exposing graft or racketeering in lawless labor unions and trade associations would be a service to both members and the public. The break-down of the voting by geographic areas was as follows:

New England, "yes," 100 percent.

Mid-Atlantic, "yes," 96.3 percent; "no," 3.7 percent.

North Central, "yes," 97.6 percent; "no," 2.4 percent.

South, "yes," 90.2 percent; "no," 9.8 percent.

West, "yes," 100 percent.

Pacific coast, "yes," 100 percent.

That is a fair analysis, outside of the unions, of the way industry, which is serving 89 percent of our production today, registered. I feel that you feel as I feel that all-out effort, every sacrifice should be made to the men facing the common enemy and giving their all. Upon every occasion where the armed forces have spoken they have condemned the attitude of organized labor in demanding higher wages and in striking. Right at this very moment there are a number of strikes going on throughout America. If our men in the theaters of war should strike, what would be argued? The least we can do is to give them every cooperation humanly possible without interference. If any of you wish to see this original letter, I have it here now and I will be happy for you to look at it. I have the envelope in which it was enclosed, with the mark of the censor, and the name signed to it. It is not phoney by any means.

Col. Eddie Rickenbacker, a hero of two world wars, on the 12th of March made a few observations regarding conditions in America today. I wish to devote the rest of my time in quoting some scattered excerpts from America—Let's Get Fighting Mad, by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker:

Let me begin by answering the unspoken questions which are probably in the minds of many of this audience. Why am I speaking, and on what basis do I speak?

I come to you as the voice of millions of American boys—your boys who cannot speak for themselves because they are in uniform, on the battle lines, on the high seas or under them, in the air, or in the training camps.

I come to you with a background of personal contact with thousands of those boys in New Guinea, Port Moresby, Buna and Gona, Australia, the Fiji Islands, and in the hell holes of Guadalcanal.

I come to you from dugouts filled with mud and water, from men waist deep in the swamps of the jungle, from the fox holes and the hills, from the hastily dug graves, and from the hospitals where man and boys, crippled and maimed, lie in torment and suffering.

Yes, may I say also, that I come as one who has looked death in the face, a time when one develops, in the twinkling of an eye, an entirely new sense of the material values of life.

True, you can't win a war without fighting, and the strongest must do it. But, short of actual combat, every man, woman, and child in this Nation is in the fighting forces, just as much as they.

I say "is in the fighting forces." Let me correct that and say "should be" or "must be," because there are millions who not only are not in but are actually a drag anchor on those who are trying to fight.

On second thought, "drag anchor" is much too mild to apply to many of them. They are little short of saboteurs and traitors.

They work against our all-out effort to win, cost us defeats, cause the unnecessary death of our American soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen, delay the day of victory for our forces.

After the disaster at Pearl Harbor, Secretary of the Navy Knox is quoted as saying, "A half-hour would have made all the difference in the world."

Perhaps, now, you understand better why I am urging you to eliminate the incompetents in Government, the racketeers in labor, the "patrioteers" in industry, all those whose objective is greedy, grasping, selfish personal gain.

Their measure is the dollar. Mine is the lives of American boys and the preservation of a decent democracy.

I have no objection to men earning money, provided they earn it by industry, honest effort and competent work.

I do object to their getting it simply because some laboring racketeer threatens to tell his men to walk off a job and stop work at a time when production is vital to the safety of our Nation, and means life or death to American boys.

Then further says Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker:

Back in 1917 a Minnesota boy about to go into the Army told his side of the story. This is what he wrote:

"I am a mother's son. I am the pride of a family and part of a home. I love my wife as you love yours. I am a youth in years and experience in life, yet I am a gambler, betting the highest stakes a man can wager, my life. If I win you win; if I lose I have lost all. The loss is mine, not yours; and there is a grieved mother, a saddened family, and a broken home to which I can never return.

"I ask only for Godspeed and support of my Nation in return for laying upon the altar of my country my all. For bravery and blood will you furnish bullets and bread? Will you pawn your shekels if I pawn myself? Will you bet your gold while I bet my blood? Will you hazard your wealth while I risk my life?

"I am the flower of a Nation's manhood, the glory of a noble race. I am the American soldier. I am the boy in the trenches."

Today millions of boys like that are marching in the armed forces of our Nation, a smile on each face and a song on the lips, though each cannot help but realize all that lies ahead.

In their hearts each must be asking the same question which that boy asked in 1917, "What are the folks back home doing to back us up?"

FOOD RATIONING

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the rationing and pricing of food is now in the hands of three agencies:

First. The Office of Civilian Supply in the War Production Board, which hopes to have a complete set-up of personnel, including economists. We hope there will also be businessmen to make decisions. Mr. Whiteside, the head of that unit, is an able businessman. He has been head of Dun & Bradstreet for years. We would hope that he would not put an economist in a position of authority, but would only use them for research and advice.

Second. The Food Administration for War, under Chester Davis. This outfit has its units controlled by economists—its price and rationing units by economists who have the say; they have made a terrible mess of things.

Third. The Office of Price Administration has units relating to food under the control of economists; they likewise have made a terrible mess of things.

The administration under Roosevelt has neither the character nor the courage to straighten this thing out and get rid of these incompetents. It is a menace to the war effort, and the action of the administration in continuing is a stab in the back to the boys who are in our armed forces, but it is just another instance of President Roosevelt's failure to cooperate with the war effort. With the food situation, the price and rationing situation in such a muddle; with Harry Hopkins, the Rasputin of the White House, in a key position in connection with the allocation of war materials, America faces a critical situation—perhaps the most critical in her history. It is absolutely necessary that we reduce the number of rationing units to one and get some efficiency in this situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER

Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and include certain data.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and include certain telegrams from packers showing the hardships which the O. P. A. is placing upon the packing industry of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

REPUBLICAN FOOD STUDY COMMITTEE

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the Republican food study committee is composed of 40 Republican Representatives who are interested in obtaining the food facts of production, distribution, and consumption. There is nothing new about such a committee, as there have been similar committees in previous years. Heretofore, I had never taken a part in the work of the committee, but this year I felt that some very constructive work could be accomplished. I feel that it is the duty of the minority party to make constructive suggestions in regard to legislatior and not spend its time indulging in destructive criticism. It is a path I expect to continue to follow. The gentleman from North Dakota, the Honorable WILLIAM LEMKE, made every effort to perfect a bipartisan committee to meet the problems of agricultural production.

When we became engaged in this war we were told that food would win the war and write the peace. We have seen industry and labor practically perform miracles. We have seen the aircraft industry expand beyond all expectations; we have seen tanks, guns, bombs, and all munitions of warfare produced on a scale that was heretofore thought impossible; we have seen transportation agencies accomplish results thought unbelievable; we have seen coal mined in larger and larger quantities and more tons per man; the building of ships is far ahead of schedule. While there may be some individuals who have not made their best contributions, I think that history will record the achievements of labor and industry during the past year not only as a production phenomenon but will show what a free people can accomplish in time of need.

In order for agriculture to carry its share of the responsibility in connection with the war it has, in many cases of necessity been required to produce under severe handicaps. Materials, labor, housing, and transportation were provided for the industrial production and agriculture was asked to produce more with less labor and many times less equipment and transportation than they had previously. Nature made a splendid contribution in providing the best weather conditions we had had for years.

I do not wish to be critical of the manner in which the food problem was approached because the necessity for these instruments of war was so imperative that food production might not have had the consideration which many of us thought it should have been accorded.

I want to digress right there to say that I do not believe a single Member of this House after Pearl Harbor had any question in his mind but what he wanted to see as many planes, as many tanks, as many munitions of war produced as possible. We did not hear anything about any labor bills at that time; we did not hear a criticism as to what agriculture was being accorded because I think 99 people out of 100 realized that the immediate necessity was the production of these munitions and implements of war.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I prefer to wait until I finish the main part of my statement; I shall have plenty of time in which to yield.

Men by the thousands went from the farms to help make these munitions of war. Materials were allocated for the purpose of producing weapons of war and these materials were, of necessity, denied the producers of food. As the industrial machine approximated its maximum production and as the difficulties of food production became more apparent there came to be more of an appreciation of the importance of food in connection with the war. This resulted in the migration of a million and a half people to the farms between March 1 and May 1, 1943. In order to maintain or increase food production, it is necessary to look ahead as we only have one crop a year and there are many factors to be contended with, even during that one year. With its 340,000,000 acres of crop land, there is no reason to believe that the increase in food production could not have been accelerated as rapidly as the industrial production that we have witnessed. This is indicated by the fact that the production of many farm products was increased by 50 percent in a little over a year's time. Believing that, statistically, we are still in a position to furnish the necessary food needed during this emergency, it is fitting that we stop occasionally and take inventory of the situation as it exists.

First. We must consider that there are still two schools of thought. One is that all that is necessary to provide food for our soldiers, our domestic population, and for lease-lend is to have someone put a price ceiling on the product in the market place. Adherents to this philosophy seem to think that if someone writes 10 cents on a can of peas in the grocery store the consumer is being protected.

The second school of thought is that the best production of our Nation and the most desirable insurance for our consumers and, incidentally, the very best method of not only preventing inflation but also avoiding starvation is by providing for an abundant food production.

The people who evidently belong to the first school of thought are the farmer subscribers to the Henderson philosophy and, now, the Brown philosophy, the consumer groups who are not familiar with the problems of food production, and the "me too" group of our society who either have not the energy or the initiative to think for themselves.

The advocates of the second school of thought, which include the national grange and other farm organizations, economists who have had practical backgrounds and all people familiar with the processes of stimulating food production. We also find a difference of attitudes among this second group. The three forces which have hindered the maximum production for which this second school of thought has been working are first the scarcity group which still have the control philosophy in their minds, second the deception of the producer groups by certain bureaus of the Government that have taken place.

I do not say that in any criticism; it is just a statement of fact. It is regrettable that it happened, it is too bad it ever happened but it will have its effect on production as far as 1943 is concerned.

Third. The bottleneck in food production as a result of the machination of the O. P. A. The farmer, by nature, likes to and wants to produce in abundance. It is not necessary to buy his cooperation and he does not want anyone to be paying for his patriotism. People should realize that the producer has done a splendid work and that although the E flags for his meritorious performance have been few, he has also made a startling contribution to the war effort and this is especially appreciated when one realizes the handicaps of the labor, equipment, parts and transportation difficulties that he has of necessity had to contend with The consumer has had food so cheap for so long through a plan that subsidized the domestic producer that it came as a rather severe shock when it was necessary for him to pay somewhere near the cost of production to secure food. There is no doubt but what the subsidy to the producer has been, in many, many cases, reflected in a lowered food cost to the consumer.

That has been one of our difficulties all the way through. They keep referring to 1939 prices but they do not realize that most of the farm products were bringing only 50 to 75 percent of parity at that time. Then they try to show how much more the farmer is getting at this time and what increased quantities he is producing, but the comparison is based at the one year of 1938 of lowest prices that existed during the last 10 years.

Speaking for no one but myself of this Food Study Committee, I feel that the bill, H. R. 2739, as introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS], represents a constructive suggestion. The time has surely come when we should not have such a divided authority over so many important questions. If the food part of the Office of Price Administration is transferred to the Agricultural Department so that one man has the responsibility for the food from the time the seed goes into the ground until the food is placed on the consumer's table, a very constructive step will be made in behalf of the food program. If this Food Study Committee should never do anything except present this legislation for the consideration of Congress, it will have been well worth the effort.

If this study committee should never do anything more than to submit the legislation it has recommended for the consideration of Congress, it will have been well worth while, in my opinion, for out of its study has come constructive suggestions which can be put into operation.

I have had an opportunity, as I presume all the rest of my colleagues have, of seeing the efficiency of our township, county, and State officials. It is disheartening to me at times to see the happenings that take place as a result of either our legislation or the powers that are assumed by certain individuals without the benefits of legislation. I repeat what I said yesterday—that if we are going to see these small businessmen, one after another, forced to the wall, we can at least insist that it be done in a legal manner and according to the law.

And I think many times as we sit here that we should realize the effect of such legislation on the county officials and people out home who are trying to make these things tick, and make them work. It is not merely a case of getting up here and criticizing the bureaucrats, the thing needed is to get this job done and to do this we must have these agencies out there in the field on which we can depend, if we are going to get these things carried through. They are trying to make these rulings work. I realize that we have the Patman Small Business Committee and the Smith Committee to Investigate the Usurpation of Power by the Bureaucrats, the special Boren committeee in regard to grade labeling and newsprint, as well as the regular committees of the House that have tried to approach these problems. No man can say that the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from South Carolina, the Honorable HAMPTON P. FULMER, has not exerted every energy as far as he is concerned individually to try and correct the situations that make many of us believe that certain agencies are more interested in putting through their particular schemes than they are in furnishing the food to win the war. We have had hearing after hearing before all these committees but no one has been able to show yet where the following provision of the law gives these bureaucrats any authority to put businessman after businessman out of business:

(h) The powers granted in this section shall not be used or made to operate to compel changes in the business practices or methods, or means or aids to distribution, established in any industry, except to prevent circumvention or evasion of any regulation, order, price schedule, or requirement under this act.

Sometimes, I feel that these committees, which are naturally controlled by the majority, are apt to be rather lukewarm in their approach and whitewashing in their effect. These problems transcend all party or partisanship consideration. How about the small businessman as a part of the food program? What has happened and is happening to him?

Once again, I wish to remind you that the Ways and Means Committee bill to allow the increase in the public debt had a special amendment that prevented the executive department of our Government from placing a $25,000 limit on salaries. Since this amendment had majority sponsorship and both majority and minority support, and was readily passed, I wish that someone would tell me why, by the same token, we do not protect the thousands of businessmen who are suffering from rulings of this same Price Control Act. If this assumption of power received legislative consideration for the few in the higher income brackets, why isn't it as much our duty to give equal consideration and protection to the small business firms of our country? These packers and canners and other groups are a part of our food-production program and we should not allow any agency of the Government, the O. P. A. or any other, to make rulings that are not in strict conformity with the letter of the law and that do not contribute to increased food production. I was pleased to accept this appointment by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the Honorable JOSEPH MARTIN. I am happy to have the opportunity of working with our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota, the Honorable AUGUST ANDRESEN, a Member of this body who has been an outstanding Member in protecting the rural and business interests of our country.

In conclusion I have here an exhibit A which I want to present. For example, here is a letter I received from one of my constituents. There can be no partisanship about this one because he happens to have formerly been chairman of the county Democratic committee. He is one of my best friends and has been throughout the years. He is an honest man and a good businessman and even though our political beliefs have not always coincided we have always been very close personal friends. He used to be a mail carrier. Then he bought himself a butcher shop and a little grocery store in a town of around three or four hundred people. He has had a son in the service a couple of years. I want you to hear the letter he writes:

DEAR REID: I am writing you concerning the Office of Price Administration No. 27 pertaining to butchering cattle by small butchers. If the thing is allowed to stand as it is (the handwriting is on the wall) it will mean that thousands of small butchers like myself will have to turn the key in my door. This meat must be graded by an official grader of the Government, and the nearest one is at Green Bay, which is some 50 miles away. The cost of these graders is $2.20 per hour from the time they leave Green Bay until they get back again.

If we were in a big supermarket so we could have our meat all killed and on hand at a certain time each week it might be all right. But as it is, being only a small operator, it is going to cause an extreme hardship on us. One week we may have a lot of meat, the next week hardly any, and if we should kill before the graders get around, we can't touch a thing until he gets here—even if it is of 4 or 5 days or a week.

If this is allowed to go on, we might as well fold up.

I would suggest that they make us post a small bond if they are afraid we will run a black market.

If there is anything you can do about this, I know you will.

As ever,

Respectfully yours,

A. B. AVERILL.

Now, just stop and put yourself back in that little town. You are running that little butcher shop. You have been running it for 20 years. The people have confidence in you. They know you would not handle any wares you should not handle. You tell your people you have got to get some one from 50 or 60 miles away to look over the meat before you can offer it to the community.

Mr. GWYNNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GWYNNE. Has the gentleman been able to find any law which authorizes the O. P. A. to do many of the things they are doing?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I have tried to have a lot of confidence in the 230 lawyers we have in the House, but I cannot find any lawyer who has found that authority, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The price-control law is quite specific as to congressional intent with reference to what the O. P. A. can do, but I generally find that they interpret the law to suit their own convenience and issue their directives and orders to suit themselves. Their main purpose is to liquidate most of the small business of the country and change our method of distribution of food, and set up a new order which may seem strange to the American people.

With reference to the roll-back on butter, meat, and coffee that is being proposed now, they are going to roll back the price of butter 5 cents a pound and are going to pay a subsidy to the processor to make up that difference, so the farmers will not have to take any loss. I have indicated before that the saving to the average consumer in the United States on butter is 60 cents. The cost of the subsidy from the Treasury will be $90,000,000 to finance that saving of 60 cents a year to the individual.

On meat they propose to roll back the price 2 cents a pound. We are allowed 2 pounds a week under the rationing system. We save 4 cents a week. That is to lower the cost of living. That is 4 cents a week or $2.08 a year. That is what you are saving with that roll back; still it will cost over $300,000,000 out of the Treasury to finance that subsidy.

On coffee they propose to roll back the price 2 cents a pound. We will save 20 cents a year on that and it will cost about $100,000,000 to finance the subsidy on coffee.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Does the gentleman have any figures as to how much extra it will cost us because of the roll back and the additional employees that will be necessary to put that into effect, to collect this subsidy in the form of taxation and redistribute it to the people? The gentleman did not mention that.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The O. P. A. is asking for an appropriation of $175,000,000.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. To pay a $90,000,000 subsidy?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. No. That is to police it. They will have to go into every business establishment, they will have to have so many auditors that every other man, woman, and child in the United States will have to be an auditor to check the books to find how much they made on the over-all picture and to determine whether or not the concern is entitled to a subsidy.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I understand that the representatives of the dairy industry are in Washington today protesting against some of the proposed rules and regulations which are going to be put into effect on June 1, under the general roll-back order. I have letters from many creameries in my State. One small creamery tells me that if this rule goes into effect they will lose approximately $40,000 to $60,000 a year. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he has any information as to whether this rule and regulation is going into effect on June 1?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. If I could read the minds of the superintellectuals down in the O. P. A. I probably could answer the question. I am doubtful if they can work out the mechanics to put it into operation on June 1. What the gentleman has said with reference to representatives of the dairy industry being here today conferring with the O. P. A. and the R. F. C., and also Mr. Chester Davis, is correct. They are trying to work out the mechanics. The administration is taking it for granted that the subsidy will be paid and that the roll-back will go into operation, but when it will go into operation it is impossible for me to state at this time.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] was discussing the matter of supply and food. You have a food investigation committee in the minority of which you are a member. You have discussed a very, very important subject which should be given unusual attention by the consumers of the country, and especially the members of that committee. The gentleman indicated he has an A example on food production. Would the gentleman permit me to give him an A and B example of an occurrence that is happening immediately, at the present time which is affecting the food situation throughout our Nation. Would the gentleman permit me to give that? It will take just a few minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. If it does not take too long.

Mr. STEFAN. I have lived in my district for over 34 years and in my State for over 57 years. I know nearly every feeder in my district. Some of my feeders have been feeding cattle for a quarter of a century, having approximately a thousand to three thousand head of whitefaces which they buy from all over. They buy the feeders in your State, they buy them west of us, and bring them into my district to feed. A great deal has been said about proteins, and the need for them. We cannot get proteins now. Some of the feeders who have been feeding cattle in my district for a quarter of a century, having over a thousand head, and up to 3,000 head, in their lots in the past have none in their lots today.

They held a discussion in my district recently, may I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and one gentleman whom I know intimately, Lewis Smithberger, a great feeder, declared at that conference that while he usually feeds a thousand head of livestock at this time of the year, this year he has no cattle on feed.

This is the first time in 25 years or longer that such a condition has existed on this particular farm. This feeder is afraid to buy feeder cattle at the present time without some assurance against loss. He fed 24 head recently on corn and hay for 108 days and made 30 cents a head, not counting anything for labor, taxes, depreciation on buildings, or machinery. The margin between cost and selling price was $2.56. The gain was 2½ pounds per day, and the gentleman from Wisconsin understands what that means.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Another friend of mine named Armbruster, with whom I am very well acquainted, is feeding 340 head, but is selling them off because he does not see anything ahead but a loss, and is afraid to put more feed into them. This same man, Mr. Armbruster, recently held a sale of hogs and after the sale was announced, the Government decided to force the price of hogs down to $14.50. His breeder sows which the previous year were worth $90 to $100 each, brought $60 to $65.

That is an A and B example, and I want to say to my colleague from Wisconsin, I wish they could solve the problem of foodstuffs, but what is being done about a solution of that problem which has a direct bearing on the production of food which we need to feed the armed forces as well as the civilian population. Our farmers are anxious and worried.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. How could I be expected to give a solution to the problem in a 5- or 10-minute discussion that Fulton Lewis has spent about 3 months on? But, we have got to get the facts; the main trouble is we are without any definite information and we have to get the facts first in order to try to solve the problem.

Getting back now to the question of cattle: We have in the United States around 75,000,000 head of cattle; in North America we have approximately 100,000,000 head, including Mexico and Canada. South America has about 100,000,000 head, an equal number, 44,000,000 head of which are in Brazil and 33,000,000 head in Argentina. In other words, we have something like 200,000,000 head of cattle here in the Western Hemisphere. If we had had a program and the man who is producing this beef had confidence that those who are undertaking to control the program had some knowledge about beef production, I do not think we would have ever been in the mess we are in insofar as beef is concerned.

We are eating around 55 pounds of beef per capita. We have been importing ever since around 1913, except for a short period during World War No. 1. So naturally it has had an impact on the beef situation. The amount imported of two or three pounds per capita in the United States is not much, but it had its effect in the coastal cities.

I do not believe there is anyone who can stand up and contend that with 200,000,000 head of cattle in the Western Hemisphere we cannot furnish the American people all the beef that is necessary, not only for the men in the armed forces, but for civilians. What is needed is some assurance, as the gentleman from Nebraska has just indicated, that the feeders and producers be given some confidence.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman is not putting his finger on the question I have in mind. These people want to raise beef; they are in the cattle business and want to raise beef if they can get feed.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I will come to that in a moment. First, let me tell you about the hog business. With hogs at 13¼ a lot of them are selling at 115 to 120 percent of parity, under an authorization that will continue to September, 1944, and the farmers producing hogs in the largest numbers in our history. If the beef farmer had a floor we would see a stimulation in beef production as a result.

One of the principal methods to get the producers to increase production is by giving them some assurance as to what they will get for their product.

If the producers had some assurance and had more confidence in Washington, they would not have to spend half their time listening to the radio to find out about the latest ruling of the O. P. A.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to my colleague from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I think my colleague from Wisconsin has hit the nail squarely on the head. As the gentleman and I well know, because people from our State have consulted us again and again, none of these people have been able to find out what price they were going to be able to get for their product. My colleague will remember that that was true of the canners way back last December, and we were trying to get something done about it and could not. This is not political, because all parties were represented. We went over to see Secretary Wickard as long ago as January or February of 1941, I believe, and showed them there the mistakes they were making on cheese. We got the fruit of those mistakes, and now they have gone right into another one. We have pointed that out, and there is no correction for it. It goes from one product to another, until there is no assurance that we shall produce as much on our farms as we did last year.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I may say to my colleague that I presume that the reason for the 24-percent reduction in cheese today is pretty much right here in Washington, and would not exist today if the cheese industry of Wisconsin had had the proper consideration.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. That is right.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. My colleague agrees with that.

The point that we were able to jump that production of cheese up 50 percent in a little over a year to me was an indication of what can be accomplished if you will just get these forces working together, but you cannot do it by having the O. P. A., for example—I do not want to get into the butter-oleomargarine argument, but they have the O. P. A. sending out men around the country telling the people not to eat butter, that oleomargarine is better for them, while at the same time the Department of Agriculture is asking us for money and we are appropriating money for them to produce more butter. It just does not make sense.

As far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned, my personal experience with them is that they are always willing to listen to your troubles and they give you sympathy and consideration. I feel that one of the greatest troubles we are in now is the fact of these two schools, that the O. P. A. has been a little closer to the throne or something, because their decisions have overshadowed the decisions of the people in the Department of Agriculture that undoubtedly are much more familiar with the problems of production.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin.

Mr. HULL. I should like to call attention to a statement appearing in today's News, on page 3, as to the testimony of Mr. Stettinius before the Senate Committee on Appropriations relating to lend-lease expenditures for next year. Just now they are having their troubles about the proposal to roll back the price of butter 5 cents a pound and pay out of the Treasury $100,000,000 to the processors in the roll-back program. Mr. Stettinius said that our benefits to Great Britan next year would be $4,213,000,000. He said that food comprises 60 percent of all lend-lease shipments to Great Britain, with munitions and other industrial materials amounting to 40 percent. This is the statement he made:

> The food is distributed through retail markets with receipts ultimately reaching the British exchequer to help finance the war.

Approximately $2,600,000,000 of that lend-lease appropriation is going indirectly into the British Treasury at a time when Congress is having such an intense discussion over the matter of subsidies to American farmers.

I just want to call attention to the relative amount involved in the so-called cutting down of the price of butter, rolling back the price of butter, and the amount we are expending which will flow into the British Treasury out of the supplies we are sending abroad.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank my colleague for his timely observation. He has been very close to this food situation, not only as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee but through actual experience.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I first wish to compliment the gentleman on his splendid contribution to the House today on this subject. I was very much interested in what he had to say about the work that was done by our industry and labor in the getting of mechanized equipment necessary for the armed forces, how they all fell to after Pearl Harbor and accomplished a marvelous piece of work.

In connection with that, I think we should also pay tribute to those branches of our Government that aided labor and industry to get this all-out production for the armed forces. They are entitled to some consideration. However, in doing that, I wonder if they did not overlook another major portion of mechanized equipment that is necessary in order to win any total war. I refer now to farm machinery.

As to the Food Study Committee to which the gentleman referred in the beginning of his remarks, I happen to be chairman of the subcommittee dealing with farm labor and farm machinery. Our committee is anxious to get the benefit of the gentleman's views on that question. Therefore, I wonder, when the Department down here made the ruling a year or two ago that farm machinery could be manufactured only to 13 percent of 1941 production for the farmers, if they did not create a bottleneck there at the same time that this marvelous production was stepping up the other way, so that we shall not have the heart and the men to man the war equipment that is necessary because of the lack of food that will come about through the failure to get this farm machinery. I wonder if the gentleman does not agree with me that in order to have this total production we should have for this all-out war, practically equal priority in consideration should be given by those who are managing this war to the production of essential farm machinery, so that we may get to the farmer what he needs to plant and harvest his crops.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not think there is any doubt about that at this time, but I still stand where I did before and where I stood in my office during those months. For all that I would surely like to be good to my constituents, as any Representative would, I surely was not going to take the position the first 6 or 8 months, or the first year of the war, for that matter, knowing that we had 700,000,000 or 800,000,000 bushels of wheat in storage, knowing the stock piles of corn we had in storage, and knowing that the immediate problem was this matter of producing tanks and airplanes and other war materials. I did not want to put my judgment up against that of the people who should know and say that they should divert any particular amount of steel to agriculture, because I was not in a position to be able to judge and I had to take their judgment that they were doing the right thing by diverting it all into the production of the munitions of war.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I did, too, and all the rest of us did, but does not the gentleman believe today that some of this should be diverted?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes; the food problem is much more serious today.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In conclusion let me ask this further question. I hold in my hand H. R. 2226, introduced March 13, 1943, a bill to prohibit the Federal Government from aiding in the production of rice outside of the United States, its Territories or possessions. Reading into the bill I find that the purpose of it is to prohibit the Government or those branches of the Government from furnishing tractors and other agricultural implements outside of the United States for the growing and harvesting of rice. Do I understand, or can the gentleman tell me whether or not we have been furnishing farm machinery and equipment for agricultural products outside of the United States, at a time when machinery is sorely needed by our farmers within our own borders?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Material was furnished in the lend-lease bill a year ago. The argument at that time was that we had better send the machinery to England rather than food, and, as I remember it now, there were some 10,000 tractors included in that bill at that time, in regard to rice—and that applies to peanuts also—I know that one of our colleagues, Mr. STEPHEN PACE, of Georgia, who had been following that for a month or more so expressed his position, and I feel as if I am free to repeat it, if I can judge from conversing with him, and it is that at this particular time with the world food conference and with everything involved in the war, he believed he would like to feel that any steps that he would take would not interfere with the war effort. I do not know whether they can even grow rice in Cuba. I would not be able to answer such a question. There are some 20,000 rice farmers in this country, and any one of them can say: "We have the land, and if we only had the machinery we can produce more rice now than they ever will produce in Cuba," and as an individual I cannot tell you whether Cuba is in a position to produce more rice than they can here.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. We are all agreed with the gentleman. We do not want to do anything to interfere with what is necessary for the war effort, but at the same time we cannot overlook the fact that food is very essential to the war effort.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. Along the machinery line in fairness to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] and also the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] you indicate that hac the Department of Agriculture had the full responsibility and the authority to go ahead and produce this food, we would do a better job than under the dual or triple system. Now, in the case of machinery I say to you that as a member of a committee with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER], we went deeply into the question of farm machinery, and we were told that if the Department of Agriculture recommendations had been followed out, we would have had some new machinery for the farmers, but they were overruled by another authority, the War Production Board, or some other authority. I would like to state also that we were informed that we would get no new machinery for our farms until 1944, and we are having trouble getting machinery and getting repairs. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin has hit the nail on the head when he said if the Department of Agriculture be given the authority we would get somewhere—without interference on the part of the other agencies.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank my colleague for his contribution. That situation has been ironed out as well as possible. There will be machinery made for use this fall. If it had not been for the fact that the War Production Board had diverted the farm-machinery problem over to the Agriculture Department, I doubt if the machinery would be on its way to production today. We have to have this whole food program in one man's hand from the time the seed goes into the ground until the finished product is on the table. We will then get rid of all of the buck passing, and most all of the criticism, and I may say that if we can accomplish that we will go a long way toward ironing out all of these difficulties.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. And is it not a fact that one of the things done by the Food Study Committee was to bring forth the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] that will consolidate these activities in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes; if we do not do anything more, that is something constructive, and that at least would have been worth while.

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. LARCADE. In reference to the bill that was referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUNNINGHAM], H. R. 2226, with respect to rice, I introduced an identical bill, 2470, on the same subject, and I would like to answer the question with respect to the rice industry. What brought about the introduction of this bill, my bill and a similar bill by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MILLS] was the fact that we found out that this Government had made a secret arrangement with Cuba, as far back as April 1942 to subsidize the planting of rice in Cuba, to the extent of advancing $25,000,000 in funds and in addition to furnish all of the farm machinery required for that purpose. Our farmers in Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and California were unable to get one tractor, to say nothing of parts to repair their machinery for the purpose of cultivating and harvesting the coming crop. I have protested to all of the departments of Government, but without avail, and for that reason we introduced this bill to try to stop that for the reason that Cuba is not able to produce rice properly. It is unsuited for that purpose. If they would give the farmers of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and California the machinery it would be unnecessary to expand the rice industry anywhere else. We would be able to grow all the rice necessary. Food is just as essential as any other thing for the winning of the war.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. At this time.

Mr. LARCADE. At this time. They could furnish the farmers of the rice area and all other food production centers the necessary machinery in order that rice and other food products might be grown, to contribute to the winning of the war. It is necessary because we find it is a graver problem every day on account of the shortage of food.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Louisiana?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am surprised to hear about the secret arrangement that took place in 1942, to provide $25,000,000 of subsidies to grow rice in Cuba, because I know that the rice problem, during ordinary times, has been a problem in the gentleman's section. We can produce enough rice to take care of the needs of our country and also have some to export. But what I was wondering about is this: We know that certain big interests in this country own the sugar plantations of Cuba and the refineries. I assume it is the same interests who are getting the advantage of this rice subsidy program. Does the gentleman know whether or not the people who are the beneficiaries of our $25,000,000 bounty are in fact American citizens who are interested in the sugar business down there or whether it is the rank and file of the poor peons of Cuba?

Mr. LARCADE. The arrangement was allegedly made with the Cuban Government.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I think it should be in the RECORD at this point that at least this is a loan, and it is not any direct subsidy.

Mr. LARCADE. It is a loan from the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes. As I understand it. I thank the gentleman from Louisiana.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDIS. I notice that lately they have had a change of heart in the farm machinery allotment. Perhaps the gentleman could give some reason why they have decided to allot more farm machinery next year.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. There are two reasons. I tried to cover that before. One is they feel they can spare the steel for that purpose at this time. Secondly, they have begun to see the importance of food production. It has been brought home to the people a little more in the last 90 days than it was before that. People close to it might see that this was happening ever since we got into the war, but were not in a position to do much about it. Now they realize that we must keep up this agricultural production. As the gentleman knows, if they will do what they say they are going to do in 1944 we will not be in such bad shape as far as machinery is concerned.

Mr. LANDIS. The gentleman knows that the bipartisan committee worked on this since the first of the year.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes: and they did good work. It was an absolutely nonpartisan approach, and I am sure they should be complimented on the way that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE] and his committee presented that farm machinery problem at that time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I recently surveyed a section of my district and in the part of the State from which I come, with reference to farm machinery. There is no doubt there is a very serious shortage of farm machinery. That shortage is crippling the farmers a great deal. But I want to add to what the gentleman has said with reference to the shortage of machinery, that if the War Production Board would exercise some reasonable foresight in providing materials to even repair machinery which is presently available, so that the machinery that is broken down could be mended and put back into service, it would help to relieve the critical shortage of farm machinery.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I think we can look forward to that taking place. I think that is the approach that the leaders of this agricultural program are trying to accomplish, and that they are making steps toward that.

Mr. BROOKS. I have been in some little shops that need just a little bit of steel here and there to place upon farm machinery to make it workable, and because of the lack of priorities they cannot get iron to repair the machinery, and the machinery lies idle in the field.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. But I want to repeat, beginning on December 7, 1941, we must remember that the psychology of every one was to do nothing that would keep from producing all the munitions of war that we could produce. It takes time to work it out. Unfortunately we might have had a New York City man here who did not really understand the problem, and it takes a little time to iron it out. But I believe that at the present time, whether it was by the bi-partisan committee or any other committee that was responsible for ironing it out, it is being ironed out, until today we should be fairly well satisfied with the picture as far as parts for machinery is concerned. Is that not right?

Mr. BROOKS. No. I am sure the gentleman has made a careful study of it, but I have recently talked to a distributor of farm machinery, and he impressed upon me the fact that if these little repair shops could get parts or the steel necessary to repair the machinery, it would help a great deal.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. But has that not been provided now?

Mr. BROOKS. No, it has not.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. But is it not being provided for by the allocations of steel from now on?

Mr. BROOKS. I hope it will be in the future, but to date it is not yet provided for. Little blacksmith shops out in the country areas trying to repair machinery are unable to get even steel out of which to make repairs, nor the parts really needed to repair the machinery.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I have not had so much difficulty myself so far as machinery was concerned, repair parts, and so forth, needed for increased production. If other Members have, I feel sorry for them. I have been quite fortunate in being able to iron out dozens of these cases, and we have to have a great deal of machinery in Wisconsin with all our dairy cattle. It takes many different repair parts for machinery, milking machines, and everything else. I have personally felt as though they were kind of trying to get the job done better every day. I may be just taking a Pollyanna attitude; maybe I am wrong, but I had a feeling we were kind of in the process of getting the thing ironed out.

Mr. LANDIS. Let me clear up one more point. The gentleman left the impression that agricultural production is still being controlled by the well known advocates of scarcity. Would the gentleman care to elaborate on that any further?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I do not think there is any doubt that we have had 10 years of varying surpluses of certain crops. I said that did not apply to all of them or to all products. Human beings being what they are they cannot in one day jump from a controlled program to a full production program, and unfortunately that is tied up with politics a little bit, because possibly if they do not do it just right you lose control and you might also lose control even at election time. That kind of ties into it. But I think the men down at the Department of Agriculture have tried to get rid of that control approach.

We hear a lot about labor unions and men having to join a union before they could do any work to help win this war. I have lots of things to do besides thinking up unpleasant things, but I have often thought to myself that if I lived out on a farm and I had to have someone tell me that I could not raise corn unless I raised 90 percent of this or 42 percent of something else, that it would not work very satisfactorily. Such a program does not make sense in a food production program. I saw from an article the other day by Mr. Davis that by 1944 they are going to have the controlled food program well out of the picture. They have got to get back to a production program.

Mr. LANDIS. How about our farmers in the flooded areas of the Midwest? Will it be necessary for us to introduce legislation to prevent penalties being assessed against those people if they have to go to other crops?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I believe our colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], has a bill to take care of certain phases so far as his State is concerned. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN] is familiar with that program. I will ask him to explain it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There are probably ways to get at that. I traveled through the State of Indiana on Monday afternoon of this week and I could see literally tens of thousands of acres there covered with water and the crops that had been planted just rotting away. At the present time, as the gentleman knows, the Department of Agriculture, or the triple A have a regulation that a farmer can plant only 5 percent more corn than he did last year unless he plants these extra war crops. If he plants more than 5 percent additional corn acreage he is denied the benefit checks unless he also plants these other crops that are specified. I think it would be a good idea for the Department of Agriculture to lift that restriction on production and tell those farmers in Indiana and Illinois to take every possible acre they can and plant it into corn and soybeans so they will have some crop to feed their livestock. If they do not do that we are going to have a decided shortage in corn this coming year.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. GWYNNE. Does not the gentleman believe some of our trouble is due to the fact that we have some people in the Government who in spite of their oaths of office are more interested in trying to make the country over than they are in winning the war? Does it not get down to that finally?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yesterday in my few remarks I said that Congress used to pass laws and bureaus followed them but that today it seems we have to pass laws to keep the bureaus from doing things they were not authorized to do in the first place.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is correct.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is about the situation in many cases, I may say to my colleague.

Mr. GWYNNE. Does not the gentleman believe a few good impeachment cases might serve notice on these people that we are still operating under a constitutional type of government?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Iowa enjoys the reputation of being a very learned judge. I do not believe I should enter into the legal implications of his question.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I think the gentleman, by reason of his very keen mind and former association with some of the men who are probably handling these affairs down here could prevail upon these bureaucrats to come back and live according to the Constitution.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. My friends in the Federal service follow the spirit as well as the word of the law. They are mostly old civil service employees and not politically appointed.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] whom I see on his feet.

Mr. CHURCH. Awhile ago the gentleman said that most of this difficulty was due to man-made troubles. Does not the gentleman believe he should have said due to the troubles these long-haired men have made?

If we could get rid of those long-haired men, we might avoid such critical situations as we find the O. P. A., W. P. B., and other agencies in this week due to their theories.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois, that as the gentleman from Minnesota just inferred, I try to be a little bit sparing in my criticism of the long-haired boys and the bureaucrats.

Mr. CHURCH. I am more interested in what is going to happen the next few days. These men as advisers to O. P. A., to W. P. B., to Justice Byrnes, and others have brought about chaos and uncertainty. What are the industries with inventories of meat, coffee, dairy products and such going to do with their losses if the O. P. A. carries out plans we are hearing of this week?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. That is largely in the hands of the Appropriation Committee. The appropriation for the O. P. A. will determine what is going to be the attitude of the Congress and the people. What disturbs me more all the time is the query, Where is the law that gives anybody down at the O. P. A. the authority to do all these things? That is enough to disturb anybody.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not want the gentleman to put himself in the same class with some of the long-haired gentlemen to which the gentleman from Illinois referred just now, because I know, as a matter of fact, the gentleman from Wisconsin had to come up the hard way and did have some practical experience and had to work his way through, whereas the men who make up these regulations, these super-intellectuals, as I call them, have never had a day's practical experience and are trying to work from a blueprint to change and remake our economy.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I always appreciate the kind words of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JENNINGS. I have listened with great interest to the informative remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I want to interpose at this time a suggestion, or rather a communication, that I received this morning from a hard-headed east Tennesseean who in the First World War fought to preserve this country and to save our way of life. He is very much exercised and concerned because of a long news article that appeared this week in a Washington paper listing about a dozen or fifteen aliens who had high salaries and who are in high places of power in this administration and undertaking to make this country over according to the pattern that they brought with them from the countries of their origin. He was very much concerned about that. He was wondering if what he did with his gun and with the sacrifice he made to preserve this country was to go by the board.

Recently I came in contact personally with men who have not been over in this country long enough to get dry behind the ears but within a short period of a year have been jacked up from a salary of $3,800 a year to $6,500 a year, when it is my candid opinion from what I have seen of them, heard of them, and observed, any job that any of them is competent to fill ought to be abolished.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I will answer the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee by saying that he has talked with people of his district, he has read the newspapers, and he has conversed with his colleagues, and I believe he will agree with me when I say that that feeling of apprehension is not only from our side of the aisle. I would call your attention to a news article in the paper within the last couple of days in which our present Acting Speaker in a very constructive manner presented some of the things that had to be ironed out as far as Government employees are concerned. I do not think the apprehension is all on our side of the aisle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to answer the gentleman who just spoke, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes at the conclusion of the other special orders for the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McMURRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. McMURRAY]?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy listening to our colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] speaking on these problems of food production, but I could not help but wonder as he was discussing the problem of production whether or not we would have any workable system of distribution by the time the problems of production were solved. I have been disturbed by the mail I have received in the past several weeks from successful merchants, from men who have been in the grocery and meat business, retail merchants, for anywhere from 15 to 30 years. They are writing me, telling me, and showing me conclusively that it is practically an impossibility for them to stay in business and carry out the regulations and the instructions of O. P. A. Almost every day the Washington papers carry stories of the testimony of witnesses before various committees of this House and the other body.

The distinguished gentleman from Texas, chairman of the Committee on Small Business, is here in the Chamber and is going to address the House for 30 minutes this afternoon. I know that his committee members are disturbed at the reports that are coming to Washington from these small businessmen. It seems to me that the committee of the House more than any other committee responsible for this situation and the committee that should assume the responsibility is the committee that wrote the Price Control Act of 1942—the Banking and Currency Committee. I grant you it seems apparent, at least to a layman, that the language included in that bill was clearly enough written so that any reasonable person would believe that we were going to make use of the methods and systems of distribution that we have developed and operated successfully in this country.

I think the major difference between rationing in this country and rationing in Great Britain is the fact that in Great Britain they have very definitely made use of an approved system of distribution of wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers, and have put into effect a plan under which they receive a fair and reasonable profit for their efforts to get food from the producers, and in that country very often from importers to the table of the consumer.

I make these remarks in view of the interesting remarks made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. Speaker, I really asked for this 10 minutes for another purpose, perhaps not as important as this discussion with respect to raising and distributing food.

Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 25, I introduced a resolution requesting that June 26 be designated as National Baseball Day to perpetuate and honor the memory of Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday, founder of America's national game of baseball.

This resolution was introduced at the request of Hartford Chapter No. 1, Veteran Baseball Players of America, Inc.

General Doubleday is generally recognized as the founder of the game of baseball as we know it today. It is true that various kinds of ball was played prior to the introduction of our present game. We knew of games such as barn ball, two old cat, three old cat.

While I think it is very proper that we honor the anniversary of the birth of General Doubleday, it occurred to me that this observation might well be tied in with our efforts to promote the sale of war bonds and stamps. The latter is now under consideration by the Treasury Department, and over this week end I hope to have the opportunity to talk with a representative of the office of the high commissioner of baseball, as well as the managers of some of the big-league groups in New York City.

Baseball is our national game, and the baseball fans of America are certainly an enthusiastic group of citizens. I believe if the major and minor leagues will cooperate and agree to play one game during the week ending June 26, charging as admission to the game a receipt showing the purchase of a War bond or a reasonable number of stamps within that week, more than a billion dollars would be subscribed to that week.

I believe this idea could be carried on into the smaller communities, through the large number of semipro and amateur ball clubs who, I am certain, would be glad to cooperate in such a plan.

There is no doubt in my mind but what the sporting editors of newspapers from one end of the country to the other would assist materially in the promotion of this program.

May I urge my colleagues to give some thought to this proposal and, if possible, confer with some of the sports editors in their own districts.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], who had been given permission to address the House on Monday, may have the same time allotted to him on Tuesday of next week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANSWERING MR. MURRAY OF WISCONSIN

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] has had much experience in the production of food. He was for a time, as I understand, a county agent. I do not know of any person who is better qualified all the way around on the farm and food production than county agents. They not only must have knowledge of the subject, but they must be practical, they must be diplomatic, they must know how to deal with people, to use tact in dealing with them, but naturally people with whom they deal have a great deal of confidence in them, so I appreciate very much the gentleman's remarks.

NOT JUST GRUMBLING, GRIPING, AND GOSSIPING

I know the gentleman has tried to be constructive, and very much different from the type of argument we usually hear, that is just grumbling, griping, and gossiping just complaining about everything that is done without considering the fact that we are at war. The gentleman has tried to offer something that was really constructive.

LOT OF THINGS WRONG

I know that there are a lot of things wrong with our country. We expect a lot of things to be wrong. We cannot disrupt our economy, disrupt the way of living of 135,000,000 people, deprive them of doing the things they are used to, without causing a great deal of trouble and many inconveniences. If the people had never gotten used to all these things they would not miss them, because people do not miss what they have never gotten used to. But since we have gotten used to so many modern conveniences and geared the business of our country to produce things needed in the war, and then we have gotten into a global war, the largest war in the history of the world, and are compelled to resort to rationing and to regimentation, necessarily we will be irritated, we will be confused and the regulations that are made, even though necessary, in many instances will be irritating to us. We just naturally do not like them. But at the same time I realize that in a large program, in a huge program such as this one, there will be a lot of mistakes made; we in Congress can expect a lot of mistakes; the country can expect a lot of mistakes, but what I expect is that these mistakes may be quickly corrected. And, I join our friends of this House who have criticisms to offer for the failure of people in certain Federal positions for not correcting errors where obvious mistakes are made; I am irritated by them.

MEN AND WOMEN IN UNIFORM MAKING THE REAL SACRIFICE

But often upon examination and investigation we find it is not as simple as at first we might think. There are so many factors involved that when we understand we agree maybe we have been too hasty in our conclusions. So let us keep in mind that we are engaged in the biggest war this world has ever known. Let us not overlook the fact that there are some seven to nine million men in this country who are in uniform and who are really the ones who are making the sacrifices. We are not making a sacrifice. What are we giving up? We are giving up very little.

WHAT ARE WE SACRIFICING?

I heard the Speaker of the House, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, not so long ago, speaking at a Texas breakfast, in which he emphasized the fact that he was not giving up much if anything; that he was getting plenty to eat, plenty to wear, and enjoying modern comforts and conveniences; that the people who are making the sacrifices in this war primarily are the men who are serving in uniform, and their loved ones, fathers and mothers, wives and children; they are the ones who are making the sacrifices.

REPUBLICAN FOOD STUDY GROUP

With that understanding let us look at some of these problems that have been brought to our attention. This food conference committee of the Republican Party is one: I regret that in this great body of 435 Members it is necessary for a political party to organize any group since they are members of the committees of the House, recognized minority Members, entitled to rights guaranteed by the rules, to bring up the subject and to insist upon hearings about any subject they desire.

Then they can have the hearings printed; they are official, they are public records, they are distributed to all Members of the House and the Senate, and they are available for public distribution. By having both Democrats and Republicans on the committee, I believe you must agree there is just a little bit better balance there than if they were all Democrats or if they were all Republicans.

WHY REPUBLICAN COMMITTEES?

Since we have a recognized set-up here in the House of Representatives, one that has been proven over a period of more than 150 years as the best system in the world, I see no reason why we should organize any political party into committees to study the very problems the recognized congressional committees are studying; that might be construed as just a little bit in opposition to the existing order. But if they have anything good to offer, I am willing to receive it and glad to have any constructive idea they have.

In order to more thoroughly and more fully carry forth the point I am hoping to make, may I suggest to you that the committee the gentleman mentioned awhile ago, the Committee on Small Business of the House, of which I happen to be the chairman, has been working for months and months on this food problem that he discussed. In the month of December 1942 we filed a report in which we insisted that there should be one agency to handle food. That was months ago, and we have been insisting on it ever since. Practically every thought that the gentleman brought out that was wrong has been advanced by our committee in written reports either to this House or to the Speaker of the House. So I join him in the hope that there will be one agency that will have to do with food.

NEW SET-UP

This afternoon's papers carry the story that there is an entirely new set-up, there is a War Mobilization Director, the Honorable James F. Byrnes, former Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and he will be succeeded as Economic Stabilization Director by the Honorable Fred Vinson, one of our former colleagues in the House. All of you, practically, know these two gentlemen. Every one of you will agree that they are men of the very highest type, the kind like Marvin Jones, the kind with good common sense and reason, men who know what should be done and how it can be done, who know how to execute laws and rules and regulations and at the same time do it all in the public interest. I do not know that the President could have selected two better men than those two. I congratulate the President on his fine selections of able men to fill these two important places. I am inserting herewith the order of the President and his statement concerning this new organization:

MAY 28, 1943.

OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION

STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT

To unify more closely the work of the war agencies concerned with the production, procurement, transportation, and distribution of military and civilian supplies, materials and products, I am creating the Office of War Mobilization, which will be under the direction of Justice James F. Byrnes.

Justice Byrnes will be assisted by a War Mobilization Committee composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chairman of the Munitions Assignment Board, the Chairman of the War Production Board, and the Economic Stabilization Director. The committee has been purposely kept small so that it can function most effectively. But the heads of the various departments and agencies will be asked to sit with the committee whenever matters of special concern to their departments or agencies are under consideration.

The committee will lay down unified policies and develop integrated programs and will see that the policies established and programs developed are expedited. In addition to its regular meetings, the committee will meet from time to time with me in the Cabinet Room.

We are entering a phase of the war effort when we must streamline our activities, avoid duplication and overlapping, eliminate interdepartmental friction, make decisions with dispatch, and keep both our military machine and our essential civilian economy running in team and at high speed.

Justice Byrnes is resigning as Economic Stabilization Director to become Director of the Office of War Mobilization. Judge Fred M. Vinson, of Kentucky, now a member of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, will succeed Justice Byrnes as Economic Stabilization Director. Judge Vinson was a Member of Congress for 14 years and for 8 years of that period a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

EXECUTIVE ORDER PROVIDING FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN OFFICE OF WAR MOBILIZATION

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States, particularly by the First War Powers Act, 1941, as President of the United States and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and in order to provide for the more effective coordination of the mobilization of the Nation for war, it is hereby ordered as follows:

I

There is established in the Office for Emergency Management of the Executive Office of the President an Office of War Mobilization which shall be under the direction of a Director of War Mobilization (hereinafter referred to as Director), to be appointed by the President.

II

There is established in the Office of War Mobilization the War Mobilization Committee (hereinafter referred to as the Committee), of which the Director shall be the Chairman and with which he shall advise and consult. The Committee shall consist, in addition to the Director, of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chairman of the Munitions Assignments Board, the Chairman of the War Production Board, and the Director of Economic Stabilization. The Chairman shall request the heads of other agencies or departments to participate in the deliberations of the Committee whenever matters specially affecting such agencies or departments are under consideration. It shall be the duty of the heads of the agencies and departments to supply necessary data to the Director and the Committee.

It shall be the function of the Office of War Mobilization, acting in consultation with the committee and subject to the direction and control of the President—

(a) To develop unified programs and to establish policies for the maximum use of the Nation's natural and industrial resources for military and civilian needs, for the effective use of the national manpower not in the armed forces, for the maintenance and stabilization of the civilian economy, and for the adjustment of such economy to war needs and conditions;

(b) To unify the activities of Federal agencies and departments engaged in or concerned with production, procurement, distribution, or transportation of military or civilian supplies, materials, and products and to resolve and determine controversies between such agencies or departments, except those to be resolved by the Director of Economic Stabilization under section 3, title IV of Executive Order 9250; and

(c) To issue such directives on policy or operations to the Federal agencies and departments as may be necessary to carry out the programs developed, the policies established, and the decisions made under this order. It shall be the duty of all such agencies and departments to execute these directives and to make to the Office of War Mobilization such progress reports as may be required.

IV

The Office of War Mobilization may perform the functions, exercise the powers, authority, and discretion conferred on it by this order through such officials and such agencies and in such manner as the Director, subject to the provisions of this order, may determine. The Director shall receive such compensation as the President shall provide, and within the limits of funds which may be made available, may employ necessary personnel and make provision for supplies, facilities, and services necessary to discharge his responsibilities.

All prior Executive orders insofar as they are in conflict herewith are amended accordingly.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 27, 1943.

ONE AGENCY HERETOFORE RECOMMENDED

With all due respect to the recommendation made by the gentleman's food conference, composed of 40 members of the Republican Party, with no Democrats on that committee, may I suggest that the bill that finally is the result of their labor is nothing more than just a recommendation that all food be under a food administrator. That is all there is to it. That is in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], who I presume is the chairman of this Republican food conference committee.

Whom do they want to make Food Administrator? I thought Chester Davis was one of the best administrators in the country. I applauded the appointment by President Roosevelt of Mr. Davis as Food Administrator. But under this bill Chester Davis would not be Food Administrator. The Secretary of Agriculture, the gentleman who has been criticized here so much, is designated as the Food Administrator.

One gentleman referred to the fact that he pointed out serious mistakes to the Secretary of Agriculture months ago, and that no effort has been made to correct those mistakes, yet this group is proposing to place food under that very man, who they claim has not corrected mistakes when shown them. I am not saying the criticism is justified. It is pointed out to show inconsistency. That just anything is wanted for a change.

Our committee has not been idle on this recommendation after we made it in December. We have sought every opportunity and advantage to properly present it to this House. You gentlemen know that, after all, consideration is the main thing, getting the right kind of consideration. You can iron out many problems and many difficulties if you can get the right kind of consideration by the right people. We have pending before our Committee on Banking and Currency now, of which I am a member, the committee that handles the price administration legislation, a bill known as a bill to extend the Commodity Credit Corporation and to increase the authorized funds. To that bill I proposed days ago to introduce an amendment—the amendment has already been prepared and it was read into the RECORD—proposing one Food Administrator.

O. P. A. NOT TO BLAME FOR EVERYTHING—WHAT ABOUT CONGRESS?

Who is to blame for this confusion? I will tell you who is to blame. Congress is to blame, that is who is to blame. It is easy to kick the Price Administrator around, it is easy to blame everything on O. P. A. O. P. A. has been guilty of lots of things that were wrong, of too many things that were indefensible, but where they are not altogether to blame, why place all the blame there? I know the blame today was placed on the Price Administration, but when the price-administration law came before Congress, Congress at that time did not trust the then Price Administrator, Mr. Leon Henderson on farm prices, and Congress put into that law a provision that the Price Administrator could not fix any price on any agricultural commodity without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. Therefore, Congress divided the authority. We had a dual responsibility there. That has caused an endless amount of confusion and trouble. Who is to blame? Congress is to blame. Congress should have corrected it a long time ago, but Congress did not do it.

LITTLE PACKERS

The gentleman says that the little packers have been greatly pressed and crushed. I thoroughly agree with him. I think that the ones administering that law were absolutely wrong. It has been injurious to a larger proportion of that industry than any other industry in the country, as vital and essential as it happens to be in this war effort, in particular. They were wrong, but who caused it? Divided authority caused it. We had O. P. A. before our committee, we had Secretary of Agriculture Wickard and Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Grover B. Hill before our committee face to face. We said, "We want to know who is responsible for this thing." You know what happened. O. P. A. said, "We knew something had to be done. There was a price squeeze. We could not afford to let meat go out of sight in price to the consumer. We had to fix it, but then we had to fix the price on the live animal to keep from squeezing out the little packers, and we, O. P. A., went to the Agriculture Department and we insisted on fixing the price of live animals, but Agriculture said no." They could not move, because Congress said the Department of Agriculture must approve these prices.

DIVIDED RESPONSIBILITY

So we have a responsibility there, and we might as well assume it, and they wrangled for months and months, and during this time there have been dozens and dozens of little packers forced out of business—absolutely wrong, almost criminal. Yet it was because of the divided responsibility placed in these two agencies by the Congress, and in that condition Congress must accept just a little bit of the blame. But now, since we have found out we have this confused situation over which we have control and caused, I think we should correct it. But should we do it by making the Secretary of Agriculture the Food Administrator? I think Chester Davis is as good as you can get.

LET DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE ENFORCE

I am for one Food Administrator, and I am going to insist upon it in this bill; and, furthermore, I am going to insist that the Department of Justice enforce these rules and regulations—the Department of Justice, a regularly established and organized department of our Government, consisting of able men of both parties, on the bench, and as prosecuting attorneys and enforcement officers. I think that will go a long way toward solving these difficulties, and what you gentlemen have proposed has been proposed before. We all know it now, and what we need is its being put into effect.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I hope the gentleman will permit me to go ahead for the present and later I will yield.

MORE THINGS RIGHT THAN WRONG ABOUT GOVERNMENT

There are lots of things wrong, but when people are suffering so much, especially the men who are meeting our enemies on the field of battle, and their loved ones, and since we know that there are so many things wrong about our Government, yet there are more things that are right about our Government than are wrong about it.

PROPOSE ONE THING GOOD EVERY TIME A CRITICISM MADE

I think in wartime it would be a pretty good policy if every time we criticize the Government for something, we should mention something good that the Government has done, and I feel sure that out of the millions of things that are done every week, every month of the year, when we have to grumble and gripe, we can at least think of something constructive, something good that our country has done.

TWO MAIN OBJECTIVES

Two main objectives we have in our country today. The first one is winning the war. That is No. 1. No. 2 is preventing inflation. We have not won the war, but I believe everyone who is informed is willing to admit that he is satisfied with the progress that has been made in winning the war. Therefore our No. 1 objective is well on the way, and can we not afford to stand some of these little irritating and confusing things as long as we are succeeding in our main objective of winning this war.

RUINOUS INFLATION WITHOUT PRICE CONTROL

Our No. 2 objective is preventing inflation. We have not stopped all inflation and probably will not entirely stop it, but we have made an effort to stop it. Inflation would be almost as serious to our country here at home as the loss of the war would be in a foreign country. We do not like price control, it is said, we do not like the way prices are fixed. Yet we realize it is an immense program. Does anyone know how many commodities are involved in prices? There are 8,000,000 commodities in this country. It is an amazing figure. That includes the grades, and classes, and styles, and fashions, and designs. All of them do not have prices fixed on them, but most of them do, and whenever you come to dealing with seven or eight million different commodities you must expect some confusion, and you certainly will have it; but let us hope that just as much of it as possible may be ironed out. It takes time to do that. I think I have been too impatient probably, at least I have been impatient. I think many problems should have been ironed out before, but maybe I was expecting too much. Let us hope they will be ironed out as rapidly as possible, and these confusing and irritating things stopped. But let it be said in favor of the Price Administration, whoever administers the law, that if it had not been for some price control, we would be facing ruinous inflation today. Our dollars would not be worth 15 cents had it not been for price control, as ineffective as many people think it has been. Our dollars would not have been worthless, but almost so. So, if price control has broken down, we will have inflation. Every informed person knows that there are several dollars in the pocket of millions of people today to buy every dollar's worth of goods that can be offered for sale. So when you have that much money in the pockets of the people all over the country, and they are in competition, wanting to buy these different goods that are for sale, do not you know that the price would go to the sky, and do not you know that your dollars would decrease in value in proportion as the price went upward? Every informed person knows that. So in our talks about the Price Administration and price control, let us not overlook one thing, and that is that we do not want it to fail, and let us not abuse it, and let us not object to the extent that there would be a likelihood of its failure, because its failure would destroy the present generation in this country. Inflation will destroy it. So, price control has done a lot of good, and we cannot win this war successfully unless we prevent inflation, and to do that we must prevent runaway prices which cause inflation.

CHESTER DAVIS GOOD FOOD ADMINISTRATOR

The bill as presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] in effect does exactly what we have been advocating for months—not everything, but just the one agency part. I have not read the bill carefully, but one agency that is advocated is what our committee has advocated for months. We have often pointed out the confusion that was existing by this divided responsibility. However, I do not agree that Secretary Wickard should necessarily be made Food Administrator. I think Secretary Wickard is a good man. I think he is a good, honest, reliable, upright, and sincere person, but personally I am very much impressed with Chester Davis. Why should we just slap down Chester Davis and establish someone else up there, when Chester Davis is just getting started in the job? He is doing an excellent job. Why not give him this power?

FARM PROBLEMS AND STEEL SUPPLY

I know that not only a fair farm price is essential, but the question of machinery comes in. Particularly I want to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin for being so fair about the farm machinery question. When this war came on we only had a limited amount of steel. We did not have steel for all purposes. First, we needed steel for planes, tanks, and guns. That came first. Next we had to have ships to transport the men and materials to foreign lands. Ships were absolutely vital and necessary. Along with ships we needed escort vessels, naval vessels, battleships, and everything that went with them. Everyone of us will agree that steel for those purposes should have come first. Someone had to know how much steel we had. It was and is a military secret. We should not discuss it and disclose this information to everybody. Our enemies would like to know. They would like to have known all the time, but we did not want them to know. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, placed Mr. Donald Nelson in charge of war production. Mr. Donald Nelson is a good man for that job. He has done an excellent job. He knew how much steel we had. He knew the purposes for which it should be used. If we wanted to use steel for another purpose that should be subordinate or inferior to the purposes I have mentioned, Mr. Nelson would say, "No," and it was his duty to say "No," because the winning of the war came first, and we simply did not have enough steel to go around. I believe that Donald Nelson honestly administered the regulation or directive that was given to him. Donald Nelson knew the facts. He exercised his best judgment. I believe he did.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] a while ago made the observation that if they could only get parts for machinery, the farmers would be much better off. May I suggest to you that the first thing that Donald Nelson did on that was to order the making of parts—not 100 percent of 1941, but 165 percent of 1941, on the same theory that the gentleman advanced, that if they could just get parts they could carry on with those old machines. Not only that, but he ordered 20 percent of new machines compared with the 1941 production. We talked to him about it. We said, "Can't you raise your figures?" He said, "Later on, but right now we need steel for more important purposes." And he would point out to you and show you why. Later on he did raise it to 40 percent.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] thinks that the farm machinery problem, although not entirely solved, is a long way on the road to solution, because in addition to the machines, I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana, we must have manpower to operate those machines. There are fewer men on the farms today than there have been for a long, long time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I know my good friend from Texas has made a long, difficult, and patient study of small business. I know he is interested in the welfare of the small businessman, but I know that above that he is interested in the winning of this war. It seems to me that at the present time we can place the production of food alongside of the production of battleships. When you can produce food by simply repairing farm machinery with the very minimum use of steel, it does occur to me, whether it takes 100 percent or 200 percent or 300 percent or 400 percent, that it is conservation for the War Production Board to allot the necessary amount of steel to repair the machinery which lies broken out in the fields, in order to produce food to win this war.

Mr. PATMAN. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman. I want to produce food. I want the farmers to have all the machinery and all the manpower they can get. Everyone does. But when this war is over and history is being written, I imagine the gentleman will be satisfied with what has been done. You do not know, I do not know, we should not know about the problem, the scarcity of critical materials. It is not our province or duty, but we have entrusted to others, gentlemen in whom we have the highest confidence, and let us presume that they are honest people; that they are not trying to ruin or wreck this country. They are trying to save it. They are considering food. They are considering oil. They are considering battleships and they are considering everything. For one to say that we must just take the steel stock pile and each one take a grab at it and take his part, little as it may be, that is not sensible. We have to leave it to somebody to allocate, and we have done that.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not placing the responsibility directly at the door of Donald Nelson.

Mr. PATMAN. Well, it is his duty. That is his responsibility.

Mr. BROOKS. But I am saying that if his orders have been sufficient, then there has been unequal distribution of the steel necessary for the farms.

Mr. PATMAN. With all due respect to my good friend, how can the gentleman say it has been unequal and unfair, when he does not know? The gentleman does not know how much steel has been available for allotment.

Mr. BROOKS. I will say to my good friend, and I have confidence in his fairness and in his integrity, that I have seen machinery lying out in the field unable to be used. I have had appeals from little blacksmith shops which repair those machines for metal to do the repairing, and I have seen the War Production Board sit inert and do nothing in the face of those appeals.

Mr. PATMAN. I have seen that too, but they were the exceptions, not the general rule, and the reason for that was that they never delegated power to the local offices. I am glad the gentleman brought that up; that is one of the criticisms I have had of O. P. A. and W. P. B. They say they are trying to correct that. I hope they do. They should delegate more power to these regional, State, and district officers so they can adjust these things locally, but those little things which stick out like a sore thumb are the exceptions and not the general rule. I remember one instance that was brought to the attention of our committee, the case of a small concern that could have done a lot with certain materials that were being burned in an Army camp. Why, they just piled up a lot of fine lumber and burned it! It sounded horrible, and I do not condone any such waste; it is wrong; but you know there are always rules and regulations that have been built up over a period of time which in unusual times will not work and are not practicable and should not be used, but it takes a little time to readjust them. Railroad companies right down there in our country, in east Texas, instruct their section foremen that when they pull ties out from under tracks and replace them, the old ties which could be used for many purposes by nearby farmers who would like to buy them, that those ties must be piled up and burned. They adopted this rule to keep down the possibility or opportunity for graft or unusual waste. Corporations have had such rules as long as we have had corporations, and they were the right kind of rules in normal times, but often rules good in normal times are not good in time of war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DILWEG, of Wisconsin, for 1 week, on account of death in the family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from California, Mr. CECIL R. KING, be permitted to revise and extend his own remarks by inserting an address he made over the radio on Friday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

TUESDAY, JUNE 1, 1943

(Legislative day of Monday, May 24, 1943)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, all the ways of our need lead to Thee; our deepest cravings but drive us to Thy everlasting arms; Thou alone art our refuge and our strength. For this quiet moment may we rise above our baser selves and, instead of our cramped and cabined conceptions, may there come the lure of far horizons, the light of lifted skies. We confess with shame and sorrow that often on life's lower levels we find ourselves surprised and trapped by unworthy compromises, by cowardly concessions, by weak acquiescence, by betrayals of integrity, and disobedience to the heavenly vision. When we would do good, evil is ever present with us. But we are grateful for those better moods when even in the pressure of daily duty there comes to us the hush of solemn thoughts, vistas of splendor, windows of insight, when the darkening veil on the face of all things falls away and the inner eyes of the soul see through the sham and show of the common days. May we find Thy highway through the fields of time and sense.

Breathe through the things that are seen the peace of the unseen and eternal. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A resolution of the City Council of Springfield, Ill., favoring the adoption as a national policy of the so-called "American All—Immigrants All Program"; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Illinois relating to the care of ill and wounded soldiers and sailors returning from the wars; to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolution printed in full when presented to Mr. BROOKS on the 28th ultimo, p. 5017, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

A joint resolution of the Legislature of Illinois; to the Committee on Education and Labor:

"House Joint Resolution 47

"Whereas the growth of this country from a small republic of 3,000,000 people to a mighty Nation of 135,000,000 may be attributed largely to the fact that our high ideals of government contain a universal appeal to the freedom-loving people of the entire world; and

"Whereas the cosmopolitan composite thus formed has its roots in divers origins, the cooperation of each one of which is essential to the harmonious functioning of the whole; and

"Whereas a national program designed to blend these various elements into a homogeneous pattern and still preserve their native cultural standards is a desirable method of combating enemy propaganda directed at fostering national jealousies and prejudices which should have no place in our American way of life; and

"Whereas the basis of such a program was perfected by Mr. Avinere Toigo during his term of office as executive secretary of the State of Illinois committee on citizenship and found expression in the beautifully executed "Americans All—Immigrants All" pageant held in Springfield, Ill., in 1940 and 1941, which was the culmination of an intensive educational campaign; and

"Whereas it is appropriate that this movement should receive impetus from the city which aided in the development of Abraham Lincoln, who so ably personified tolerance in its every aspect; and

"Whereas it is of the utmost importance that the unification of divergent national concepts be intelligently and sympathetically directed toward the formation of a truly indivisible union: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Sixty-third General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the Senate concurring herein), That we respectfully urge the institution of a national program consonant with the principles stated in the preamble, and that a suitably engrossed copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to President Roosevelt and to the presiding officer of each House of Congress for such action as may be necessary."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of Alabama; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Senate Joint Resolution 14

"Joint resolution endorsing United States Resolution 114, which provides for the forming of an organization of the United Nations with specific and limited authority, and urging passage of said resolution by the United States Senate

"Whereas the people of Alabama are desirous that the war be brought to a successful termination as rapidly as possible and that guaranties of enduring peace and security be provided; and

"Whereas the formation of an organization of the United Nations as provided in United States Senate Resolution 114 is a proper step toward attaining these ends, in that said organization—

"(1) Will assist in the coordination and complete utilization of the military and economic resources of all member nations in the prosecution of the war against the Axis;

"(2) Will better enable the establishment of satisfactory temporary administrations for Axis-controlled areas of the world as these are occupied by United Nations forces until such time as permanent governments can be established;

"(3) Will further the administration of relief and assistance in economic rehabilitation in territories of member nations needing such aid and in Axis territory occupied by United Nation forces;

"(4) Will enable the development of procedures and machinery for peaceful settlement of dissensions and disagreements between nations; and

"(5) Will provide for the assemblance and maintenance of a military force and the suppression by immediate use of such force any future attempt at military aggression by any nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Legislature of Alabama does hereby approve United States Senate Resolution 114, and does urge its speedy adoption by the Senate of the United States; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Senators from Alabama, and to each of the four Senators who joined in presenting this resolution."

A resolution of the Senate of the State of Alabama; to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"Senate Resolution 33

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Alabama, in session assembled, That the War Production Board and such other authorities as may have concurred in the announced proposal to take over the car-manufacturing plant of the Pullman Standard Car Manufacturing Co. at Bessemer for the purpose of housing machinery for the extrusion of aluminum be requested to give full consideration to the fact that the existing plant is engaged to full capacity in war production, is organized and equipped to continue the operation of its car-manufacturing business upon the cessation of the war effort, is one of the principal industries in the Birmingham area processing into finished product the raw materials of that region, and that the taking over of the plant for the purposes proposed would sacrifice and destroy a permanent business for no other purpose than to provide a roof and walls for the processing of aluminum.

Resolved, further, That the Federal authorities are assured of the full cooperation of public agencies and citizens within the State of Alabama in the matter of the establishment of the proposed aluminum-processing unit, but are desirous of avoiding what is obviously an unnecessary sacrifice of one of the most important industrial units in the State fully equipped to assist in the post-war economy and assured of a market for its production if it is not dismantled as threatened by the public announcement; Be it further

"Resolved, That the Senate of Alabama does protest the action of the War Production Board in this regard and calls upon it to reconsider and rescind its action and asks that this plant for processing of aluminum be located elsewhere within the State than in the plant of the Pullman Car Manufacturing Co. at Bessemer and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the National Congress, the two Senators and the Congressmen from Alabama, and the Chairman of the War Production Board."

A memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida; to the Committee on Commerce:

"Senate Memorial 3

"Memorial to the Congress of the United States of America urging that all departments and functions of the Federal Government relating to commercial fishing and fisheries be transferred from the United States Department of the Interior and placed under the United States Department of Agriculture

"Whereas by reason of the present war in which the United States of America is engaged there exists a meat shortage in this country; and

"Whereas a considerable amount of the food produced and consumed by the people of this country consists of fish and seafoods, which is helping to alleviate the existing meat shortage; and

"Whereas all departments and functions of the Federal Government relating to commercial fishing and fisheries are now administered by the United States Department of the Interior; and

"Whereas such departments and functions more properly belong under the United States Department of Agriculture and if transferred from the United States Department of the Interior to the United States Department of Agriculture, such change would be conducive to greater production of fish and seafoods and would aid and assist our country in combating the existing meat shortage and facilitate the prosecution and successful early termination of the present war: Be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Florida:

"SECTION 1. That we do hereby respectfully memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States of America to take such action as is necessary to immediately effect the transfer of all departments and functions of commercial fishing and fisheries under the Federal Government from the United States Department of the Interior and place the same under the United States Department of Agriculture.

"SEC. 2. That a copy of this memorial under the great seal of the State of Florida be immediately forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, and to each member of the delegation representing the State of Florida in both the House of Representatives and Senate of the Congress of the United States of America.

"SEC. 3. That a copy of this memorial be spread upon the journal of both the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Florida and that sufficient copies thereof be furnished to the press.

"Approved by the Governor May 27, 1943."

WAGES AND COST OF LIVING—RESOLUTION OF SEATTLE LABOR CONSUMERS' LEAGUE

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, a short time ago I received a communication from the Labor Consumers' League operating in the city of Seattle, Wash. Its vice president is Mr. L. H. Paqué; its executive secretary is Mr. Charles Mentrin; its president is Mr. Peter E. Terzick, secretary of the Puget Sound District Council, Lumber and Saw Mill Workers; its recording secretary is Mr. Roy W. Atkinson, field representative of the C. I. O.

To this communication is attached a resolution praising the President of the United States for his recent directive freezing wages. It is a resolution of commendation of the President sent by this organization, which in its letter to me uses this language:

In consideration of the Presidential directive, which pertains to wages and cost of living, you will find the attached resolution a true criterion of the temper and attitude of the American people who are partially represented by the Labor Consumers' League; and that when the public realizes the seriousness of this last Presidential directive, and the importance of it to the war effort, you will find that all of the working people are in accord with proper stabilization of wages in relation to the cost of living.

The Labor Consumers' League present endorsing body consists of over 200,000 members of organized labor in Seattle and vicinity, both American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The letter is signed by Mr. Paqué and Mr. Mentrin. I ask that the resolution attached to the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has issued a directive order wherein he freezes wages at the January 1941 level plus 15 percent thereby strengthening and adding to the formula already adopted by the National War Labor Board; and

Whereas the President in issuing this drastic order is convinced that such a course is necessary to prevent national currency inflation; and

Whereas all labor is now, and has always been unalterably opposed to inflationary methods both in finance and normal living expenses, the present trend of which is continually upwards with the wage levels remaining fixed, thereby causing those engaged both in peace and wartime industries to make more and more sacrifices in order to do their part in financing and carrying forward the war effort; and

Whereas the President with the full knowledge of these conditions, has caused the drastic directive to be issued, thereby placing the welfare of the country first and foremost: Therefore be it

Resolved by Labor Consumers' League, That we commend the President of the United States for his courageous action; and be it further

Resolved, That we petition and urge our Commander in Chief to go further in a similar directive order and freeze all items of ordinary living at the level of January 1941, with such proportionate increases to producers and wholesalers, including all transportation costs of not more than 15 percent by the retailer of all such goods; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be petitioned to create a special war fund that would provide for the payment of the differential to those wholesalers and retailers who have stocks on hand that they have been forced to acquire at prices in excess of the ceiling to be set, as previously stated in the foregoing resolve.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, beginning on page 1, line 8, which has heretofore been stated.

The Chair calls attention to the order made on Friday last, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered (by unanimous consent), That at not later than 2:30 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, June 1, 1943, a vote be had without further debate on the committee amendment to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, the time between 11 o'clock a. m. and 2:30 o'clock p. m. to be divided equally between the proponents and opponents of the amendment, to be controlled, respectively, by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

Under the unanimous-consent agreement the 188 minutes now remaining will be divided equally between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], 94 minutes to be controlled by each Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, did the Chair say 94 minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-four minutes to be controlled by each Senator. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized and the time under his control is now in effect.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Does that take into account the 21 minutes which have expired, which were necessary to be used in order to produce a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. The remaining time has been divided equally.

Mr. McNARY. Ninety-four minutes for each side?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. That is the amount of time now remaining. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. TAFT. I am sorry, Mr. President, but as the time is limited, I think it is not fair to other Senators who will follow me to yield during my talk on the question before the Senate.

Mr. President, I rise to speak in favor of the committee amendment to the pending measure. I certainly have no desire whatever to interfere with the continued operation of the Trade Agreements Act, and it seems to me the amendment will not do so in any way, but will merely leave us free after the war to determine the policy which should then be adopted.

People do not seem to understand that if we pass the pending measure we not only give power to the President for 2 years to enter into trade agreements but he may then, at the end of 2 years, or just before the end, enter into trade agreements which are binding on the United States for 3 years from that time. The extension of the power during the war does not concern me, for I think tariffs are relatively unimportant during the war; but what does concern me is that if we pass this measure and extend the act for 2 years, then, at the end of, say, 1944, the President may enter into a series of trade agreements fixing the tariff policy of this country for 3 years from that time, or until December 1947. I believe that we are asked, therefore, to tie our hands at a time when it will become peculiarly necessary to readjust our policy to whatever conditions may then prevail, conditions which we are absolutely unable to foresee at the present time.

It is said that we will not be hampered because most of the agreements have already run 3 years and are now terminable on 6 months' notice. Therefore, it is said, any additional treaties which may be made for 3 years are of no importance.

There are two answers to that suggestion. The first is that we may enter into a new treaty with a country with which we have no treaty, providing for a particular reduction in rates covered, perhaps, in some of the existing treaties, and by doing so we extend the reduction for 3 years, during which time we cannot change it in any way as to any country.

For instance, in the case of the agreement binding the duty on crude rubber, that agreement is now contained in the Peruvian Treaty and it is contained in the British Treaty. The British Treaty may now be terminated in 6 months. The Peruvian Treaty may be terminated in about 1 year from this time. But the President may enter into a treaty, we will say, with the Dutch Government, also binding rubber on the free list. We may enter into that treaty in December 1944 and, regardless of the fact that the British and Peruvian treaties are terminable, we will absolutely bind ourselves to keep rubber on the free list until 3 years from the time the Dutch Treaty is made.

There is another answer to the argument that all important treaties have already been made, and that is, that although they have been made, they may be made over again. In December, 1944, just before a new Congress begins, just before a new President enters upon his office, the Secretary of State may make a whole series of new treaties, revising the British Treaty, the Brazilian Treaty, every other treaty, and he may lay out the whole pattern of what our trade relations are to be during the 3 years following, during the next administration. He may bind rubber on the free list. He may bind chrome on the free list. He may reduce the tariffs on agricultural products, including flax. He may lay out the entire program.

It is said now that he does not intend to do so; but we cannot be sure that he does not intend to take such action. Certainly the State Department up to this time has shown an intention by executive agreement, without consulting Congress, of doing everything it can to write the provisions of the peace as it thinks they should be formulated. That is shown in the lease-lend agreement in which the State Department has, I think, and the Foreign Relations Committee thinks, gone outside its legal authority, and provided that in settling the lend-lease obligations finally we shall enter into an agreement, and that agreement shall include provision for agreed action by the United States of America and the United Kingdom directed to the expansion of production, employment, and so forth, and to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce, and "to the reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers."

It says:

> At an early convenient date, conversations shall be begun between the two governments with a view to determining * * * by their own agreed action—

The above stated objectives.

The State Department, in other words, has told us in so many words than it intends to renegotiate with the British and every other nation the terms of the reduction of our tariffs, and that it intends to do that, not at the end of the war, but before the end of the war, whenever the time is convenient.

So it seems to me perfectly clear that what we are doing in passing this measure without amendment is to authorize the State Department to write the trade provisions of the peace treaty, if the war is over by the end of 1944, and to lay down the entire basis of the economic relations between the countries of the world.

After the war we shall find an entirely different condition. The Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act under which we are now acting will be entirely out of date. In some respects we may want a much higher tariff, and in the case of other items we may want a much lower tariff than 50 percent of the Smooth-Hawley rates to carry out the general purposes of the peace treaty. Certainly currencies are going to be very different from what they were at the time the rates of the Smoot-Hawley tariff were made. Exchange rates with some countries are going to be such that the goods which come from some countries must bear a very high tariff rate if we are going to have any continuation of certain industries in the United States at all.

In respect to other countries it may well be that we can afford to lower the rates to much less than 50 percent of the existing tariffs.

But it seems perfectly clear to me that in the period after the war the Congress should retain in its hands the right to make the kind of treaties which should be made and the right to determine what should be done. It is said that if we agree to the amendment we shall discourage all the other nations of the world, and shall make them think there will be no cooperative action after the war, that we are repudiating any friendly approach to the tariff problem. Certainly no such result could follow from the adoption of the amendment which is proposed; and certainly I do not believe in repudiating the present tariff policy, in repudiating the desirability of reasonable rates, or in repudiating cooperation with all other nations.

Mr. President, at this point I want to read what I said in a recent speech which I shall hereafter ask to have printed in the RECORD.

> Of course, there are many conditions which can be established now to make nations less likely to undertake aggression in the future. First, there must be a sound economic basis for peace, one which will assure to every nation a fair distribution of the world's goods and the ability to develop its resources and capacities. In the Versailles Treaty economic conditions where completely disrupted and disregarded in the interest of the self-determination of peoples. States were set up which were wholly unable to support themselves. Europe was broken up into a large number of unstable units. In the post-war settlement we must try to establish customs unions between nations whose economies are complementary so that they can be reasonably self-sufficient. We must assure to each one of these nations and groups of nations the raw materials which they require to feed their people and develop their industrial life. We must assure to each an outlet for sufficient products at least to pay for these raw materials. If we interpret freedom from want to mean only this fair and equitable economic treatment for nations, then I think it is a reasonable goal and one which must underlie any practical plan for peace.

Mr. President, when we come to try to work out a world in which every nation will have a chance, we shall have to revise completely all existing tariffs, we shall have to approach the problem from an entirely new standpoint, we shall have to study the entire question; and we shall have to find that we cannot do it within the limits of the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. President, I desire to cite a few examples of the difficulties we shall be in if we tie our hands so that after the war, for 3 years, perhaps, we shall not be able to change many of our tariffs.

In the first place, let us consider the question of rubber. We have set up a synthetic rubber industry for which we have appropriated $650,000,000. Even the State Department takes the position that the rubber case should not be prejudged at the present time.

The report of the House Ways and Means Committee, reflecting the views of the State Department, says, regarding rubber:

> In short, the post-war situation cannot and should not be prejudged at this time. * * * The need for assisting the synthetic rubber industry after the war and the nature and extent of such assistance, if any is needed, should be determined only after the close of the war, when the question may possibly become pertinent in the light of the facts at that time.

Yet, Mr. President, if we do not adopt the committee amendment we do prejudge the case. For 3 years after the war we shall prevent the Government from imposing any tariff on crude rubber. During those 3 years we may well destroy the synthetic rubber industry. Not only that, but we would put ourselves in the hands of the Dutch and the British, who practically control the rubber supply of the world. The additions of rubber from Brazil will be very minor. It is perfectly clear that before the war the Dutch and the British held down production. The Senate will remember, from the report of the Truman committee, that even after the war began the rubber cartel, if we may call it that, held down production to 60 percent of capacity. It was only after the most strenuous pressure from Mr. Jones that they gradually increased the capacity to 87 percent, and finally to 100 percent. Throughout the history of the rubber industry our producers have been in the hands of a monopoly of the British and the Dutch, who control the rubber supply; and yet it is proposed that we give authority to the State Department to bind rubber on the free list from now until 1947, and absolutely to tie our hands against the protection of the synthetic rubber industry. I do not know whether the protection will be necessary; I do not know whether it will be advisable; but I certainly say that we should not tie our hands so that we could not protect that industry if we wished to do so.

The second item to which I should like to call attention is that of tin. Tin, like rubber, has been controlled by a cartel of the British and the Dutch, and we have had to pay through the nose in order to get tin. They have so handled tin by building smelters in Malaya and prohibiting the export of tin ore that it never paid anyone to build a tin smelter in the United States. Now, we have built a tin smelter in the United States. In Texas we built a smelter to which Bolivian ore is brought, and we produce our own tin. But if tin is bound on the free list, obviously, the tin from Malaya will come in very much more cheaply than the tin which can be produced in Bolivia and then smelted in Texas, and, after the war is over, we are going to find our Texas smelter shutdown, without any possibility of continuing, because we shall have tied our hands by a 3-year agreement. I do not think any intelligent administration would wish to have the power to tie up this country for 3 years. I do not understand why there is any opposition to the provision that when trade treaties are made they shall be terminable 6 months after the war.

The third item to which I should like to call attention is that of chrome. Chromite or chrome ore was also bound duty-free in the trade agreement with the United Kingdom. In the book on World Minerals and World Peace, by Leith, Furness, and Lewis, the following observation is made with respect to chromite:

> The United States: Because of wartime reduction in imports, the United States has started a large-scale development of low-grade chromite ores in Montana. Production is expected to be at the rate of over 500,000 tons per year—more chromite than has ever been mined in a year by any country.

Again it should be noted that in the past the world production of chromite has been dominated by a practical monopoly exercised by the Chrome Trust of London. The discovery in recent years of deposits in Asiatic Turkey has tended to break the control of this monopoly, but not completely. The continued development in the United States of chromite production would make the United States independent of this monopoly situation.

Yet, Mr. President, if we pass the joint resolution without the limitation proposed by the amendment we shall give the State Department the power to tie our hands so that the chrome industry will come to an end when the war comes to an end, although we have chrome deposits available.

Take the question of flaxseed—an agricultural product. There are many other agricultural products, but let us take the question of flaxseed. Prior to 1938 from 60 percent to 80 percent of the flaxseed consumed by the United States was imported, principally from Argentina; but as a result of the wartime demand the sown acreage of flaxseed in the United States has increased from 1,000,000 acres in 1938 to more than 6,000,000 acres in 1943. The United States production of flaxseed has increased from 8,000,000 bushels in 1938 to 50,000,000 bushels in 1942. In the Argentine agreement the duty on flaxseed was reduced from 65 cents a bushel to 32½ cents, for the period of the emergency, and to 50 cents thereafter. We are asked to give the State Department authority to reduce the duty on flaxseed to 32½ cents, and to bind it for 3 years, so that we would provide a sufficient time during which the farmers of the United States would have to abandon the production of flaxseed; and it would be almost impossible again to establish a very desirable industry, and one which is giving work to many American farmers.

The wartime development of certain industries in the United States as a means of providing essential and critical materials which have heretofore largely been imported from abroad creates a serious problem in many respects. The problem is summarized as follows by Mr. Alonzo E. Taylor, in an article which appeared in the Harvard Business Review during the past winter:

> On the one side, it is necessary to visualize the position of the United States and of other manufacturing countries. Before the war, total manufacture in the United States was nearly half of total manufacture in the world; is this proportion to be maintained, lowered, or raised? Is technical progress to be reversed? Having proved utility and cheapness of substitute materials, are we to discard patents and processes, demolish plants, and disrupt enterprise in order to return to import of Asiatic fibers, etc., i. e., revert to where we stood before the war? Having learned synthetically to provide replacements for rubber and tin, are these achievements to be submerged in a political policy for the support of Asiatic exports?

I do not purport to give an answer to that question. I only say that we cannot decide it now. We should not give the State Department the power to make treaties during and just before the end of the war, which will bind us for 3 years from that time to a tariff policy and tariff rates, and bindings on the free list which will prevent our taking the steps which may be necessary to continue to build up these industries to the point where they may become completely self-supporting.

One provision of the Danaher amendment is that when we make a treaty, instead of making it for a period which binds us for 3 years, we should make it for a period which would bind us only until 6 months after the war, by which time we must reconsider the entire tariff policy of the United States and our trade relations with all the other nations. It means that we should have a free hand to deal with those trade relations.

The only other thing in the Danaher amendment is that the termination may be by act of Congress. I am inclined to agree that Congress could probably terminate these agreements, anyway, after 3 years, or, thereafter, after 6 months' notice is given. After the expiration of 3 years Congress could raise the tariff rate; if the new rate were made effective after 6 months, so that the State Department might give notice under the treaty. I am inclined to think, therefore, that that feature does no more than to state exactly what the present law is; but since some doubt is raised, I see no reason why we should not call the attention of the other nations to the fact that these treaties may be ended by act of Congress, as clearly they may be.

Mr. President, a comparison is made between this policy and that of flexible tariffs. I am entirely in favor of flexible tariffs. Personally, I am in favor of delegating to a commission the making of tariffs; but if we are to make that delegation it must be made with certain definite standards. The flexible tariffs have been made on the standard of making a tariff rate equal to the difference in cost of production here and abroad so as to enable the American producer to meet the competition of foreign production. However, under this act there is no such standard. That is why I do not believe we can properly delegate the power, whether it is constitutional to do so or not. It seems to me that we should prescribe a standard if we are to delegate that power. We are putting in the hands of the Secretary of State—in some cases, at least—the power absolutely to destroy an American industry. I do not believe that Congress desires to grant such power, and I do not believe it should grant such power. Obviously, there is no review of the action of the Secretary of State, because there is no standard upon which his action may be reviewed.

In the reciprocity treaty with Canada, which I very strongly favored, in the first place, there was no general reduction of rates. The treaty related to Canada only. In the second place, the reciprocity treaty was with a country which has practically the same standard of living as we have, and a country in which the greater problems of tariff do not arise. I would be prepared again to vote for such a treaty. Furthermore, it was submitted to the Senate, and was approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

The authority which we are considering is simply an authority to the Secretary of State to reduce all tariffs 50 percent, and in the course of doing so, to get anything he can from other countries. The rates which he has attacked, which are about 60 percent of all the rates, have been reduced to 57 percent, so he has gone a long way toward the full authority contained in the act.

Of course, if one is for free trade, he is in favor of the Secretary going all the way to the 50 percent. Anyone who believes that every rate on the books is 100 percent too high, naturally would be for this trade-agreement policy, because it would reduce all rates to 50 percent of what they were. However, if one desires a scientific method of deciding what the tariff ought to be, I do not see how he can be for the trade agreements, unless some kind of standard is imposed, which will have to be complied with by those who are administering the treaties, some standard which will actually prevent the destruction of any American industry.

Mr. President, it is not as if this policy had tremendously increased our trade. It has not increased our trade. It may have done so in the case of trade with some countries; but if we look at the figures on international trade, we find that the greatest trade we ever had in the history of the United States was under very high Republican tariffs, in the period from 1925 to 1929. For 5 years our exports averaged $5,000,000,000 a year. For 5 years our imports averaged $4,200,000,000 a year; and yet when we come to the 5 years from 1936 to 1940, after the trade-agreement policy had been well started, anyone would think, from reading the newspapers, that there had been a tremendous increase in trade. As a matter of fact the average exports for those 5 years were only $3,400,000,000; 70 percent of what they were back under the high tariffs of the 1920's. Imports were only $2,600,000,000, or 65 percent of what they were under the high tariffs of the 1920's.

There is no evidence that this policy has increased foreign trade. Taking the total foreign trade as a percentage of total goods produced, and considering first exportable goods, from 1923 to 1927, under high Republican tariffs, the percentage of foreign trade exports was 10 percent of the total goods produced. From 1937 to 1940 it was only 7.7 percent of all the goods produced, or approximately a 25 percent reduction from the figure back in the 1920's.

Again, in percentage of national income, from 1925 to 1929 the percentage of national income represented by exports was about 4 percent. In 1940 it was 3.2 percent. In other words, a much smaller amount of trade has resulted from the trade treaties than existed under the high tariffs of the 1920's.

In spite of this, Mr. President, I should vote for the continuation of the trade agreements, for one reason, because during the war tariffs are not of great importance. I certainly do not wish to disrupt a policy which, in general, has been wisely administered, but it seems impossible to me to vote for an authority to the President under which he may absolutely tie the hands of this country immediately after the war, at a time probably more important to our future economy than any other time in the history of the United States, and at a time when our hands should be free. We should be able to impose lower tariffs than 50 percent, or to impose higher tariffs if we wish to do so to protect new industry, to protect ourselves against depreciated currencies in particular countries, and to meet the conditions which will confront us at the end of this war as they confronted us at the end of the last war.

At the end of the last war it was insisted that we pass an emergency tariff act, and Congress did pass an emergency tariff act, to protect the wool and other industries, in which competition from foreign sources immediately after the war was so severe as to threaten the complete destruction of a number of industries. Mr. President, I should like to vote for these treaties. It seems to me that the amendment for which we are asking is very simple. If that amendment is not adopted, then I see no recourse except to ask that Congress be given the power to pass on the treaties in the beginning, and asked to approve each treaty as it comes, in order that Congress may have some voice on a fundamental issue.

What possible reason can there be for our not insisting that treaties which are made now shall expire 6 months after the war, in order that we may meet the tremendous and difficult problems which this country will face at that time?

Mr. President, as an evidence of my general views on cooperation with foreign nations after the war, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the address which I delivered at Grove City, from which I have quoted.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Dr. Ketler, young ladies and gentlemen of the graduating class, and your friends, it is a great pleasure for me to come to Grove City at the invitation of my old friend and classmate, Dr. Ketler, and get away for a day from the pressure and confusion of Washington. Ohio, like Pennsylvania, is the home of small colleges, and those colleges determine the character of the people as much as any influence in the State. Ordinarily, you would go out to reform your State. Now you graduate into a world at war, and it is your task to set it right. You have spent many years in preparing yourselves to meet the problems of a world at peace. Now, you must turn aside from every plan that you have made for life, and participate in the greatest war effort which this country has ever made. I sympathize with you because one of my own boys is graduating this year from another college, and going into a service for which he has had little preparation. But there is no alternative. We have no choice except to carry this war through to overwhelming victory over Germany, Italy, and Japen. Otherwise, the world won't be worth living in.

With a victory in Africa, I think we can feel that it is only a question of time—though perhaps a long time—before our armies march to Berlin and to Tokyo. Up to this time we have been exclusively concerned with winning the war, but I believe the time has come when we should sit down and determine just why we are fighting the war and what we are going to do with victory when we obtain it.

My own belief is that the United States went to war in order that his counry and its people might enjoy peace now and in the days to come; in order that they might be left free to work out the destiny of the American Republic. We went to war to make clear that national aggression cannot succeed in this world; to punish the aggression which has occurred and discourage aggression in the future. We went to war to prove that so far as the American Republic is affected, might in this world will not make right.

I do not believe that we went to war to establish the "four freedoms" or any other freedoms throughout the world, and I do not believe we went to war for all the purposes stated in the Atlantic Charter. We did not go to war even to establish liberty throughout the world, except as such a world condition might result from the insurance of our own liberty. Look only at the history of the last 10 years. We did not go to war against Japan when it attacked China. We did not go to war with Germany when it attacked Czechoslovakia or Poland. War occurred only when our people came to believe that aggression was so dangerous and so likely to be successful in the world that our own safety was threatened. That led, first, to aid to Britain, and, finally, it led to war itself. I was opposed to entering the war because I did not believe that aggression in Europe was so dangerous as to threaten our own safety even if it attempted an attack upon us across the oceans. As I analyze the public opinion which led us gradually to war, it was an opinion which disagreed with this view. Perhaps it was correct. Now that war has been undertaken, our people are determined to carry it through to complete victory and a severe punishment of the aggressor, not only for our present safety, but to discourage aggression for all time to come.

I don't believe, therefore, that we are engaged in any crusade of the "four freedoms." The first two, freedom of expression and freedom of religion, have to do with the individual citizens of each country and their relations with their own government. Certainly we are not going to undertake to interefere with the internal government of every country in the world because they may fail to grant freedom of expression or freedom of religion. We would not only have to defeat our enemies and establish governments in the Axis countries with American constitutions, but we would have to interfere with the governments of our allies. This is not a war of democracies against dictatorships. There is no freedom of religion or freedom of speech in Russia. There are benevolent dictators in Brazil, in Cuba, and in China. There was a dictator in Poland. In Greece, which made one of the most magnificent defenses against aggression that has been seen in this war, the people were governed by a dictator, Metaxas, who was so benighted as to prohibit in Greece the reading of the Republic of Plato. Surely we are not going to interfere with the internal governments of Russia and China and other nations in order to insist that all of their citizens enjoy freedom of expression and freedom of religion. If we are, we will have to have a permanent army a good deal larger than 11,000,000 men, and we will have to suspend for a long time any renewal of freedom in the United States.

As a matter of fact, the Atlantic Charter itself contradicts the idea of any crusade for these freedoms. The third paragraph of that document states that the parties "respect the rights of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live." That means that the Russians can have a dictatorship of the proletariat if they wish to. It means that China can be run by a generalissimo and avoid elections of every kind. It means that other governments with a democratic form may permit the subjection of the rights of freedom of expression and freedom of religion to the will of the man whom they choose to elect.

The other two freedoms are freedom from fear and freedom from want. It is just as impractical to insure these freedoms as the other two, if they are construed as individual rights of men against their own governments. If they are intended to relate to the country itself rather than its citizens, a victory in the war can certainly be used to advance national freedom from fear and want. Freedom from fear, after all, means no more than the discouragement of aggression by other nations. Freedom from want as applied to nations means that every nation shall be given access to the raw materials which it needs and to the markets required in order that it may have the exchange with which to purchase these raw materials. While I don't believe that we went to war in order to assure these freedoms to every nation in the world, certainly if they can be established as a result of the war, we wish to establish them. We should certainly use the opportunity offered by victory to obtain many important improvements for which we would not have gone to war.

I feel very strongly, however, that no war can be justified as a crusade—even for world freedoms. If we prevail in the war, it is undoubtedly true that the principles for which we stand will be stronger throughout the world. The world will have to be made over in any event, and we can certainly establish a system of which liberty is the cornerstone in every country where we have the power to do so and the people appear to want it.

If we admit that the United States can properly go to war to impose our ideas of freedom on the rest of the world, then it seems we must admit that the Soviets have a right to crusade to impose communism on the rest of the world because they believe communism to be the final solution of the world's problems. We would even have to admit that Hitler, however deluded he might be, had a right to crusade to impose his ideas of national socialism on the world. A crusade is by its very nature an aggressive and emotional act. Our purpose in this war is to punish and abolish aggression. If war can be justified as a crusade, the world will face perpetual war.

Finally, I believe every American will agree that we did not go to war in order to acquire more territory for the United States, or to rule the world, either by ourselves or in combination with our allies.

If our prime purpose in fighting this war is to insure peace and independence for the American people now and hereafter, what does that mean in terms of present policy and post-war planning? In the first place, it emphasizes again the preponderant importance of winning the war. I am not one of those who feel that the winning of the war is secondary compared to the winning of the peace. The very winning of the war accomplishes half or more than half of our principal purpose. It punishes the aggressor. It crushes him for years to come. It seems almost inconceivable that another madman like Hitler can arise for generations, convinced that he can conquer the world.

So our first job is to win the war. In fact, if we don't win the war, there isn't much use discussing our second job. I am unable to understand the mentality of those who criticize the deal with Darlan, or the arrangements with Spain, or any other step which will save American lives and bring the war to a speedier conclusion. I regret the attitude of those who insist on interfering with the British handling of the situation in India. That handling may be right or it may be wrong, but the British are in control of India, and we cannot interfere with that control without dissension and disunity, which would hamper victory. Furthermore, they have been in control of India for several hundred years, and they probably know a good deal more about the proper way to handle the situation in the present emergency than any American novelist or parlor pink. If our policy discourages a few enthusiasts in Europe and among our Communist fringe, that can certainly be corrected after the war. It is certainly much easier to cure than Mr. Stalin's statement of his intention to take over the Baltic states and eastern Poland.

But, of course, there is another job to be done when the war is won, and a job of almost equal importance to the winning of the war. That is the assurance of future peace and the prevention of future aggression, by the best machinery conceivable. It is not an easy task. For centuries men have yearned for such a result. One council of nations after another has been set up, and after every war the treaty makers have stated their purpose of assuring perpetual peace. No matter what organization of the world we set up in our generation, it is only likely to be successful 30 years from now if the next generation is determined then to make it successful.

In considering the post-war problems, I believe we should distinguish clearly between the transition period after the war and the permanent organization of the world. Many steps may be taken in the transition period which are unthinkable as permanent policy. During the transtition period the world will be dominated by the United Nations. The Axis Nations will be completely disarmed and subjected to every penalty which seems wise and effective. While this temporary power continues it should be possible to solve many problems and establish conditions and relations between nations which will give every nation a fair start in life. Undoubtedly the Axis nations must be policed, and they must be policed either by the national armies or perhaps by a special police force representing all the United Nations. It may be possible to set up economic treaties and relationships which will be fair to every country and give each access to raw materials. It may be possible to establish customs unions, establishing free trade among certain groups of nations. Certainly during the transition period we should be liberal in the provision of relief and other assistance necessary for reconstruction.

During that period also we can take our time in working out the permanent organization of the world to secure peace. The purpose of that organization must be to make as easy as possible the continuance of peace. It seems to me largely a practical question, and I should certainly be glad to support any plan if success is probable. I supported the League of Nations in 1920. I do not think we are yet in a position to determine exactly what our program should be, but certainly there should be a thorough discussion at this time of the different plans proposed. We don't know how the war will end. We don't know what the attitude of England and the British Empire and Russia will then be. Nevertheless there are certain principles which ought to underlie our thinking on the subject and certain principles which ought to be discouraged from the start.

I am going briefly to discuss three or four of these permanent post-war plans which we are asked to approve. The first is to continue more or less indefinitely the post-war control of the world by the United Nations. The philosophy of the plan is expressed in Henry Luce's American Century. We are to dominate the world, as England is said to have dominated it during the nineteenth century, but since the world is much smaller the domination will be much more effective. We are to be the senior partner in the control. Russia and China will be left to their continental interests, while, with the British as our helpers, we will look after the oceans and the rest of the world, insure peace, happiness, and liberty to all peoples.

There are several difficulties with this plan. First of all, it is completely contrary to the ideals of the American people and the theory that we are fighting for liberty as well as for security. It is based on the theory that we know better what is good for the world than the world itself. It assumes that we are always right and anyone who disagrees with us is wrong. It reminds me of the idealism of the bureaucrats in Washington who want to regulate the lives of every American along the lines that the bureaucrats think are best for them. I doubt very much if our control would be successful. Certainly however benevolent we might be, other people simply do not like to be dominated, and we would be in the same position of suppressing rebellions by force in which the British found themselves during the nineteenth century. There isn't the slightest evidence that we would make a success of our American raj. I visited Puerto Rico last winter, where we have been for 45 years without relieving poverty or improving anyone's condition. If we can't make a success of ruling a small island of 2,000,000 people, how are we going to manage several billion people in the rest of the world? The American people love liberty for other people as for themselves, and there would be a constant protest in this country against any act which smacked of imperialism. We would allow domestic politics to dominate our solution of problems our domestic politicians do not understand. We would have none of the ruthless efficiency in our colonial system which the British developed in their dealings with other peoples. In short, this plan, besides violating every principle of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution, would probably be a failure both for ourselves and the rest of the world.

The second plan, vaguely outlined in some of Henry Wallace's speeches, has some relation to the first. We are still to dominate the world, even to the extent of running the schools and universities of Germany during the transition period. But instead of emphasizing force, our control is to be through the dispensation of money and goods to carry out the ideal of freedom from want. We are to establish more or less free trade throughout the world, and distribute American goods in all directions, largely on credit. Since this school of thought believes that the Government debt should be constantly increased, and that Government deficits create prosperity in this country, we will be killing two birds with one stone by increasing rapidly our own production and giving away the products to other people. In other words, we are to maintain our control through economic generosity.

This plan seems almost too visionary to make any real headway. In the cold, gray dawn of peace, the American people are not likely to continue the lavish give-away policy of lend-lease which is necessary in war. Furthermore, I believe that with the utmost direct generosity we cannot improve materially the conditions of other countries or put them under any real obligation to us. A country, like an individual, can only become prosperous through its own efforts. We can help a people to help itself, and we ought to do so by reasonable trade arrangements and by assisting countries which wish to improve their industry, commerce, and agriculture, but we certainly are not going to do the world any good by setting up an international work projects administration.

The third type of plan which is now being strenuously urged is that of the superstate, proposed by Clarence Streit, author of Union Now. Its present form is described by Governor Stassen in the current Saturday Evening Post. According to this plan, there is to be a world government growing out of the United Nations control. This is to be a complete national government operating directly on every individual throughout the world; as our Federal Government operates on the citizens of our States. The control is to be by a legislative body like the House of Commons, which will select the executive and his cabinet. As the temporary post-war problems are disposed of, a world code of justice will be adopted by legislation, and that code of justice will be enforced by an international police force. The code of justice is to emphasize human rights rather than national rights, but obviously it will have to concern itself also with the question of boundaries. It will contain provisions protecting minorities and prohibiting religious persecution. It will have a department dealing with education and medical care throughout the world. It is not entirely clear whether it is actually to operate schools and hospitals, but certainly it is to make available propaganda in the form of books, radio programs, and movies for educational purposes. It is to administer all seaports and all airports; and while it is said that "the proposal contemplates no sudden attempt to make trade universally free," yet apparently the world state is to have power to prohibit the raising of tariffs, or other trade practices, of which it disapproves. The world state is to have power to raise its own taxes by levying an excise on international trade.

I believe the idea of a superstate with full sovereignty in certain fields is unsound and impractical. Most people think of an international police force or government as being directed at Germany, Italy, and Japan to keep them in order after the war. But remember that this is a permanent arrangement for ourselves as well as for the Axis.

The proposal is to set up a government which can do to the American people everything that it can do to other nations. If it can bomb Tokyo into submission, it can bomb New York into submission. If its police force is to be effective, it must be bigger and more powerful than the American Army, as well as all other armies. This implies an almost complete disarmament. The plan is compared to the uniting of the Thirteen Colonies into one nation in 1788, but the comparison is false. The people who were there combined had substantially the same form of government, and the same standard of living, and the same language and ideals, whereas here we are trying to combine republics and democracies and kingdoms and dictatorships under a federal state. We are trying to combine men who earn $10 a day with men who earn 10 cents a day. We are trying to combine the East and the West, the Brahmin and the Rotarian. Such a state would fall apart in a few years and leave more chaos than if it had never begun.

The attempt to regulate the treatment of minorities, of Jews in central Europe, of Negroes in the United States, and of many other equally difficult minority problems would be far more likely to produce war than to abolish it. The United States is probably the most dangerous Nation, but obviously in any question regarding our standard of wages we would be outvoted 10 to 1 under any conceivable plan of representation. Our tariffs would be reduced, or bound, and our markets raided.

My own opinion is that no such tremendous government could be truly democratic. We have about reached the practical limit of size without totalitarianism in the United States. We are being forced into more and more centralization of government, and once that centralization becomes complete, it will be difficult indeed to maintain anything like a truly democratic government in which the individual has a voice.

Furthermore, I believe the establishment of any such superstate is wholly impractical today. Our people will not agree to disband their Army and Navy or reduce them to impotency. I feel equally confident that England has no such intention and that Stalin has no such intention. In fact, if I read correctly the recent statements of the leaders of those countries, they intend as far as they can see ahead to control the Continent of Europe by a superior military force. That is the meaning of the 20-year Anglo-Soviet treaty. That is the direct statement of English policy which appeared recently in the London Times. That, it seems to me, is the practical implication of Mr. Churchill's council of Europe. If these large nations are going to rebel against international control of their seaports, airports, tariff policy, and minority treatment—and they certainly are—they cannot with good face impose these restrictions permanently on the small nations. I don't believe a superstate is practical even to enforce boundary questions. Certainly as applied to matters of internal control, as suggested in the Stassen article, it will be a nightmare.

In my opinion, international cooperation must be worked out along the same general lines suggested in the League of Nations. Any plan must be based on the retention of sovereignty by every nation, with agreements between those nations worked out as specifically as possible through general covenants and bilateral treaties. The main purpose of such covenants must be to prevent any international aggression likely to lead to a war in which all of us may be again involved. It is said that nations will not keep their promises, and of course without an international police force cannot be made to do so. The answer is that the maintenance of peace, in any event, depends upon the continued cooperation of the great powers. Not even a superstate can find a way to enforce its sovereignty over the unlimited steppes of Russia or the teeming millions of Asia or the seven seas of Britain. We must under any plan rely on the continued desire of these nations to maintain peace by carrying out the covenants into which they have solemnly entered.

Of course, there are many conditions which can be established now to make nations less likely to undertake aggression in the future. First, there must be a sound economic basis for peace, one which will assure to every nation a fair distribution of the world's goods and the ability to develop its resources and capacities. In the Versailles Treaty economic conditions were completely disrupted and disregarded in the interest of the self-determination of peoples. States were set up which were wholly unable to support themselves. Europe was broken up into a large number of unstable units. In the post-war settlement we must try to establish customs unions between nations whose economies are complementary so that they can be reasonably self-sufficient. We must assure to each one of these nations and groups of nations the raw materials which they require to feed their people and develop their industrial life. We must assure to each an outlet for sufficient products at least to pay for these raw materials. If we interpret freedom from want to mean only this fair and equitable economic treatment for nations, then I think it is a reasonable goal and one which must underlie any practical plan for peace. I do not believe that subsequently we can control the tariff policies of individual nations by force or decree, but a continued interest on the part of all in making international trade an aid to peace should be sufficient to prevent any great discrimination developing in any particular country.

Obviously, the territorial settlements must be such that they do not create constant and intolerable friction. On the basis of self-determination and a reasonable tolerance, we should be able to do a better job than was done at Versailles.

The principal question in working out a new League of Nations is to determine how far we will agree to use our armed forces to prevent aggression in other parts of the world. Many will object to any such undertaking, but I believe that within carefully-defined limits we should be willing to take an active part in maintaining peace. Insofar as Europe is concerned, I believe that obligation should be a secondary obligation after the council of Europe has made every possible effort and failed. In America and in the Far East we might assume a much more direct interest, and prompt American action in those areas, when the proposed League of Nations has found some nation to be an aggressor, may well prevent the development of a world war.

I question, however, whether our armed forces should ever be used except to punish or prevent the physical aggression of one nation against another, and to enforce any disarmament agreement which may be entered into. Apart from that, I believe that interference in the internal affairs of other nations, to protect their minorities, to change their system of education, or to reduce their tariffs, would be more likely to foment war than to prevent it Surely it is perfectly possible to work out the problems of air transportation as the problems of sea transportation have been worked out in the past, by international treaty and agreement. We don't need any international officers running our airports and seaports. We want the ability to protect our industries against the competition of starvation wages, and develop here the materials which might be essential to our survival as a nation. Our Negro problem is difficult enough without the issuance of directives from the council of a league. On the other hand, I see no loss of sovereignty in a treaty binding us to send our armed forces abroad on the finding of an international body. Being sovereign, we could refuse to keep our promises. Being Americans, we would not refuse.

The question whether we shall actually enter a league of nations must await the termination of the war. We certainly do not wish to assume any obligations unless the plan is one which gives some reasonable chance of practical success in assuring world peace. We do not wish to assume any obligation unless the territorial settlement and the other terms of the peace treaty are fair to all nations so that we can agree wholeheartedly to stand behind them. The economic arrangement must be such as to assure every country a fair deal and a chance to improve the condition of its people. But if these conditions are complied with, I have no doubt that the American people would approve a treaty obligation binding us to cooperate with other nations to keep the peace of the world.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio, who has just finished making an address in behalf of the Danaher amendment, candidly admits that the trade treaties have been administered in a way which has been a credit to the State Department and he gives every indication that eventually he will probably vote for these trade treaties, regardless of what may happen to the amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I did not indicate anything of the sort, unless some amendment were adopted. Furthermore, I said they had in general been well administered. That was the extent of my commendation.

Mr. LUCAS. Others who were listening to the Senator's speech may have obtained a different impression than that which was obtained by the Senator from Illinois. But from the remarks which were made by the Senator from Ohio I was rather persuaded that he did not have any really serious objection to these trade treaties. I may have been mistaken. Be that as it may, Mr. President, I do not rise at this time to discuss at length either the merits or demerits of the trade treaties. I shall discuss the treaties in the light of this cataclysmic storm in which the world is moving.

We are witnessing in the Senate of the United States the same type, kind, and character of debate which we have always witnessed on the subject of trade treaties. There is nothing new in any of the arguments. We seem to forget that America stands at the crossroads in the greatest crisis of her history in 150 years. These debates upon the trade treaties move along just as though we were in the throes of eternal peace. Amendments have been offered—not one but several—as I understand, of the same type which had heretofore been debated and discussed every time the question of trade treaties arose.

Mr. President, my record from the time I have been in the Senate has been one of consistency in supporting trade treaties. Regardless of what position I have taken in the past upon the trade pacts or any amendment concerning them which has been heretofore debated, I say that at this hour of the history of the world I would not hesitate for one moment to change my position in order that we might present some sort of a solid front in connection with a matter which is international in its character.

We are dealing with the hour and all its implications. Past arguments, old predilections, special interests and blocs are mere bagatelle compared with the great issue before us. Selfish people or groups cannot prevail, if it interferes with the winning of the war and the winning of the peace.

Mr. President, I wish to read some remarks made by General Eisenhower, which deeply impressed me and gave me some thoughts in connection with the subject of trade treaties. On Saturday last, this heroic and gallant general of the American and Allied forces, after the greatest victory of the war, on the north African front, made a speech, and and he is quoted in the New York Herald Tribune as follows:

"This team is bound together by indestructible devotion to a common cause. * * * We have wilted the enemy's morale, for in this theater one of the best and proudest of his armies has been utterly destroyed."

He described this as one of the intangible but "transcendently important" results of the African triumph. The most important intangible, he said, was the high degree of proficiency gained in Allied teamwork.

"This demonstration of unity on the battlefield, of unity in adversity as well as in victory, is sorely puzzling the Axis today," General Eisenhower said. "Our solidarity terrified them because they had complacently counted on divided counsels and interfamily quarrels that have been characteristic of Allied campaigns of former wars."

Mr. President, that is the nub of the situation confronting us today. The real reason for the great victory of the American and Allied forces in Tunisia was our solidarity in presenting a united front in that great battle. It seems to me that if the Senate of the United States could present some kind of a united front in connection with trade treaties involving international relationships with other nations, we would once more give to Herr Goebbels and his group of propagandists something to think about, something which might terrify them.

But apparently, Mr. President, we cannot do that in the United States Senate; we continue to have our family quarrels. Yet I undertake to say that if bombs were falling in Washington every other day, as they have been in England in the past, we would see that much-needed solidarity in the United States Congress upon legislation involving world problems.

The article continues to quote General Eisenhower:

I speak not merely of senior commanders and their readiness to meet each problem on its merits and without division along nationalistic lines but of the rank and file as well. Each man here has come to realize that the greatest patriot, the greatest lover of his country, is the one quickest to promote Allied team play and to demand its perfection. This spirit has inspired also the French troops that fought alongside us during the Tunisian campaign. For them and for their sacrificial devotion to duty, every British and American soldier has only words of praise. They were magnificent.

We are ready to undertake any further task our countries may choose to assign us. We stand as a single body—determined that there will be no cessation of effort until, working in concert with all other forces of the United Nations, we shall have brought the last army of Germany, Italy, and Japan to its inevitable "Tunisia."

Mr. President, there in that last utterance can be found the key to success. Standing as a single body these soldiers move forward to victory. We can lighten their load, remove some of their burdens, if we here in the Senate stand united on these trade pacts. I appeal to Senators to promote team work and team play on the home front. It is the greatest weapon that can be used to bring this cruel war to an early and victorious close.

Mr. President, one large concession has been made with respect to the termination of these trade treaties. Two years from July 1, 1945, the trade treaties will terminate, under the terms of the pending measure. Surely that date is far enough in the future to satisfy many who expect at that time to rewrite the trade treaties and tariff policy of this country, although I confess that I think such is only a bit of wishful thinking. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is meaningless and would nullify, in my humble opinion, what the trade-treaty program is attempting to do.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator from Illinois please explain how the amendment could be meaningless and at the same time nullify?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct in that regard; the word "meaningless" was unfortunate and unnecessary. But I submit the amendment itself would lead only to confusion and chaos so far as it concerns those who are in concert with us in connection with these trade treaties. It would nullify a record of 8 years of constructive international good. It would give Mr. Hitler and his gang the opportunity to distort and misrepresent. They would use the radio to tell people who are affiliated with us in these trade treaties that the proposed amendment means the end of kindly and friendly relationships with the countries which have been our good neighbors for a long period of years. They would advise the world that we were leaving all our friends in an economic vacuum 6 months after the shooting stops.

Let me go back to the war of 1917. It is said that trade treaties are futile. Mr. President, trade treaties fit hand in glove with the good-neighbor policy of the countries to the south. It will be recalled that back in 1916 we had troops on the Mexican border, and it will be recalled that the Panamanian Government was unfriendly to us, thereby involving the Panama Canal; indeed, as a result of the dollar exploitation diplomacy which had been carried on by this country for decades there was not a country south of the border that was overly friendly to the United States of America. Today there is not a nation in South America, with the exception, perhaps, of one, that is not our friend as a result of the trade treaties and the good-neighbor policy. Any American soldiers now found in any of these countries are there as friends and allies.

Mr. President, regardless of the merits of the pending joint resolution, in my opinion the Members of the Senate who have boys in the service, those who have brothers or nephews or close friends in the service, will be doing their country a real service if they defeat every amendment that comes to the floor of the Senate, irrespective of its merits. I say that with the utmost kindness toward every Member who will present amendments. In my humble judgment, the United States Senate should have accepted in 30 minutes the joint resolution just as it came over from the House of Representatives, in order that we might present the same solidarity of thought and purpose and action to which General Eisenhower referred in his speech in Africa. That was one thing, as he said, that frightened the Axis Powers.

Mr. President, adopt any amendment at this time, regardless of its merits, and fuel will be furnished to the lying propaganda machine of the German Government. Furthermore, regardless of what may be said, regardless of how individuals in high places of Government may understand the trade treaties, the rank and file of the people of various other countries, in my humble opinion, will misunderstand the action of the Senate should crippling amendments be adopted.

Mr. President, that is about all I care to say upon this important matter. I hope the Senate will reject every amendment which comes to the floor. The trade treaties should continue for another 2 years in the form in which they are now written. There is no reason to cause misapprehension, there is no reason, as I see it, to cause confusion or chaos to exist in other countries which are parties to these trade pacts at the present time. Certainly it seems to me that in all good conscience every individual who is interested in an international program based upon trade so far as the future of America is concerned should support these trade treaties. In my judgment, they are the basis for international peace and good will and amity in the post-war period.

Much has been said about the delegation of power to the President. I have heard it ever since I have been a Member of the Congress of the United States. Every time a delegation of power is made by the legislative to the executive long speeches are delivered upon the floor of the Senate about the destruction of the American way of life. Let me say that such power was delegated back in the War of 1812; its power was delegated in the Civil War; in fact, greater power was delegated to the Executive in the Civil War than has ever been delegated in this war. Power was delegated back in World War No. 1; and, Mr. President, the American people, after each and every war, recaptured that power which, in a crisis, had been delegated to the Executive. They will do it this time. The people are supreme in this country, and will continue to be supreme when this great emergency shall have passed.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. President, perhaps never within the lifetime of any living man has representative government been so greatly threatened or faced so gruelling a test for endurance, as today. Representative government has disappeared in many respects throughout great portions of the earth, and it is threatened everywhere. For that reason I wish to speak briefly in favor of the pending amendment proposed to the measure extending the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

Section 8 of article I of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> The Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes.

This paragraph gives Congress the power to pass all tariff laws, and clearly indicates that it is the duty of Congress to fix the policy of our Government concerning international trade.

The pending amendment merely reaffirms our determination and devotion to that fundamental principle of our representative, constitutional form of government.

The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was first passed by a subservient Congress in 1934, and it gave the executive branch extraordinary, discretionary, legislative authority over tariffs and foreign trade as an emergency measure to aid in bringing about economic recovery by expanding foreign markets for the products of the United States. It is doubtful that it accomplished this result.

In 1937 the act was extended for the express purpose of contributing to world peace, more than because of any economic objective.

In 1940, when it was apparent that it had not resulted in maintaining world peace, it was extended again on the theory that it would contribute as a part of the foundation of any stable and durable peace.

Now, in 1943, the House has voted to extend it for 2 years without amendment. We are told that if we amend it in any particular it is an indication that we are preparing to withdraw from active participation in world affairs. I do not so interpret it, and I deny that my vote for the pending amendment carries with it any such implication. I believe that the future peace of the world depends, as largely as upon any other factor, upon the maintenance and continuance of a truly representative, constitutional form of government in the United States of America.

The pending amendment provides as follows:

> Provided, That every foreign-trade agreement concluded in accordance with the provisions of said act, as amended, shall be subject to termination 6 months after the cessation of hostilities in the present war as fixed by proclamation of the President, pursuant to joint resolutions of the Congress or by the President.

This amendment, if it serves notice of any purpose, should serve notice on the countries with whom we deal, and to the executive branch of our own Government, that the Congress intends to retain its constitutional, supervisory control over trade agreements which affect the lives of the free people of America. No fair-minded person could interpret such action by Congress as being unfriendly to the most wholehearted cooperation with other nations now and in the future.

The Congress has voted for the most extraordinary lease-lend program ever enacted by any country in the history of the world. We have appropriated over $13,000,000,000—we have already expended over $11,000,000,000 of America's substance to that end. More nations than are now enjoying reciprocal trade agreements are already the beneficiaries and participants in the lease-lend program. The latest appropriation bill provides for more than $6,000,000,000 additional to be expended for that purpose. This has the overwhelming approval of Congress, notwithstanding the fact that our own Government has not to this day set up a master bookkeeping system whereby the Congress can know in detail every phase of the lease-lend activity, to say nothing about having no definite agreements as to how or when any part of these funds are to be repaid, if ever. Certainly that is no indication of a lack of desire on the part of Congress to cooperate in the future peace of the world.

Neither are we relinquishing our war effort in any other particular, for we are spending more effort and money in the production of the necessary weapons and material of war than ever was expended in the history of man. In addition, we are making every sacrifice, including the raising of an Army, preparing to send more than 4,000,000 men—the flower of our country—to foreign battlefields, to assure the victory of ourselves and our allies.

This amendment under consideration provides only that 6 months after the close of the war, when victory has been won, the Congress may have a voice, representing the people of America who have made these extraordinary sacrifices, in determining the future course of foreign trade as it relates to our people. The fact that the present administration wants the power, without any interference on the part of the Congress, to negotiate these binding, all important trade agreements is reminiscent of the fact that President Wilson failed to take the Congress in as a partner in his determination of the future course of the world at the conclusion of the last World War. Certainly it can be said aptly now that the only lesson we learn from history is that we learn no lesson from history.

Included in our lease-lend expenditures, I am sure you will find that upward of $2,000,000,000 of America's money has been spent in the development, erection, and construction of the greatest communication system ever known in the world. Literally, hundreds of installations have been made of radio towers and equipment and air fields. Transoceanic and transcontinental air routes have established, built, and paid for by America, constituting a web that will undoubtedly be the communication and the air commerce routes of tomorrow. In addition to that, we have built and paid for many other bases and harbors in countless places.

We were a Nation that built practically no ships before the war, but through the sacrifice, the inventive and constructive genius of our American people, with their money, their sweat and their toil, we are building more ships than any country in the history of civilized men.

One of the greatest contributions we are to make in the liberation and the protection of liberty-loving people all over the world, is our construction of airplanes, great cargo ships that will carry material, weapons and men across oceans and over mountains, to aid embattled China and to liberate other freedom loving people. We will produce more planes before this war is over than all the other countries of the world. We are undertaking now to develop an air force that will be equal to one-third of the air power of the entire universe. We will have literally thousands upon thousands of young men, the finest aviators in the world, familiar with these communication systems, airports and transport routes throughout the universe before this war comes to an end. The future commerce of the world will be carried in part by these ships on the sea and in the sky.

What is to become of these ships and the trade that they will carry? Shall the Congress have nothing to say about this when this war is concluded?

The people of America are devoting their lives and their fortunes to the development of substitute strategic materials cut off from us by the treacherous acts of the little yellow fiends of the Pacific. The liberty of the world depends upon our success in this field. Are these heroic efforts and outstanding accomplishments to be scrapped by the arbitrary decision at the conclusion of the war, of one man or a few who feel that they know what is best for 135,000,000 free Americans?

Will the men who sacrificed and served in the foxholes and the hellholes of the battle fronts of the world return to find that we whom they dared to die to defend have foreclosed them from having an immediate voice through their Representatives in Congress concerning the future trade relations with the world?

Shall we further scrap or abandon our constitutional responsibilities here in these halls while the flower of American youth is fighting to defend us on the battlefield of the universe?

In part, that is the question we decide today.

I yield to no man in my desire for peace. And the hundreds of thousands, yes, the millions, of veterans who will return to the shores of America with their battle scars and experience, in my judgment, will be outstanding advocates of peace in the future. My experience has taught me that authentic veterans are exceedingly practical and peaceful men. I predict that they will join in the demand that we become and remain one of the strongest nations of the entire earth not only for the protection of ourselves but for the guarantee of the peace of the future.

They will not, nor will I, join with those in America who believe that it is wrong to be strong, or a sin to be self-sufficient. I disagree with those who constantly condemn and blame America, saying we lost the last peace, or those who would indicate that we were responsible for this war, or that we will do other than contribute our full share and more to the future peace of the world. We are contributing our full share and more to the war effort in the cause of freedom everywhere today and we will continue to play our full part in the peace to follow.

When I vote for this amendment I wish to place my own interpretation upon my own act. I do it with the one thought in mind that we are serving notice to the world that we intend to be a free people, preserving a strong nation devoted and dedicated to truly representative, constitutional government.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I intend to vote for the reciprocal trade joint resolution because we are at war, because I want to do everything possible to keep the Allies together during the war, and because I want to do everything possible for sound international collaboration after the war. On these great objectives the joint resolution has a limited impact, to be sure, but in small things, as well as large, I shall do what I can for victory in war and sound collaboration in peace.

As this states my entire reason for supporting the joint resolution, it comes as somewhat of a shock to hear it asserted that all those who favor mild safeguarding amendments to the Trade Agreements Act are opposed to international collaboration. This is simply not so, Mr. President.

I have often wondered what it is about this question which makes so many men lose their sense of proportion. Otherwise, how can one explain the fact that so much—too much—is continually being claimed for the program? When I first came to the Senate the claim was constantly made that the trade-agreements program would preserve peace, end unemployment, and that it was the only device which could prevent us from going back to the worst days of congressional tariff making. Actually, of course, it did not preserve peace, it did not end unemployment, and it is not the only device which prevents us from going back to the evils of congressional tariff making.

Just as too much has been said for the joint resolution, so it is that too much has been said against this very modest little amendment. When we boil it all down what does the amendment amount to? It simply means that Congress and the President under its terms can properly revoke an agreement without being charged with any breach of international good faith. The actual power to cancel an agreement or indeed to revoke the entire act resides in the Congress at all times, but if we exercise the right without some language of this kind we might be chargeable with an act of international bad faith, and this is something which we would not and should not do.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEWART in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. In view of the statement just made, is it the Senator's understanding that the Congress, as well as the President, always has the power to repeal an existing trade agreement?

Mr. LODGE. I think that, as a matter of brute power, the Congress probably has that power.

Mr. TOBEY. What would be the modus operandi by which Congress could proceed to repeal an existing trade agreement?

Mr. LODGE. The Congress could repeal——

Mr. TOBEY. The act itself?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; the act itself.

Mr. TOBEY. In the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts, could the Congress by itself repeal a specific agreement that was made under the act?

Mr. LODGE. I think it could as a matter of theory. I do not know what the practical modus operandi would be.

The amendment simply recognizes the status of the Congress in a frank and honorable way. To refuse to accept such an amendment as this, in my opinion, suggests a rather arbitrary and intolerant viewpoint. Have we not learned from past experience that we cannot always have everything our own way without the dotting of an "i" and the crossing of a "t", and that it is good statesmanship and good democracy to compromise our differences?

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], in his speech, to which I listened with careful attention, as I do to all his speeches, gave as a principal argument against the amendment the fact that it will leave us—

> With our hands completely untied at the time of the greatest chaos perhaps that ever settled upon the world, 6 months after the termination of the war.

Mr. President, I have pondered that statement, and the more I think about it, the more I think that it is actually an argument for the amendment. I believe, as a general proposition, that the United States should be free, and should not have its hands tied in a period of great emergency—in a crisis. I was one of the five or six on this floor, as I recall, to vote against the Neutrality Act in 1937 because I believed that it would tie our hands at a time when we should need full freedom of action. It so happened that events caused Congress to repeal the Neutrality Act for the very simple reason that we did not want our hands tied in the manner prescribed by the act. With the hindsight which we now have, I think we can see that it would have been much better if we had never had the act and therefore never had to repeal the act at all under the circumstances which then existed.

Mr. President, I am in favor of America making promises which she can keep, and which she therefore will keep. I have great hope that by making only such promises as are within the range of our capabilities we can prevent periods of chaos and crisis and emergency from arising. But, Mr. President, when such periods of chaos and crisis and emergency are upon us, I want to see an America which is free to deal with the situation—an America whose word counts heavily because its word is not taken for granted.

For these reasons I shall vote for the committee amendment, as well as for the joint resolution.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, in spite of my high regard for the sponsor of the committee amendment and for its advocates, I feel obliged to present four reasons why I believe it is in the best interest of the Nation as a whole that the amendment be defeated.

These reasons are as follows:

First. The adoption of the committee amendment would tend to weaken rather than strengthen the unity of the United Nations at this time when the strengthening of our unity is of critical importance in winning the war. It certainly would not strengthen our unity with our allies thus to emphasize our option to cancel, 6 months after the war, and without the consent of our allies, all of the agreements covering their reciprocal trade relations with us. To justify the adoption of any measure at this time that would in any degree weaken our unity with our allies would call for a showing of far greater benefits to be derived from it than those which can be derived from this amendment.

Second. The adoption of the committee amendment would weaken rather than strengthen the force of our trade agreements as present and future influences against the other participants in those agreements entering into or preparing to enter into any agreements with other nations detrimental to our interests. The committee amendment would amount to a special warning to the world to place little reliance after the war upon the continuance by us of our reciprocal trade obligations. Whether or not we propose actually to terminate our reciprocal trade agreements after the war, the effect of this special emphasis upon our right to terminate them will be to instigate the other parties to them to consider entering into agreements with other nations without regard to us. The committee amendment would encourage our allies, therefore, to look everywhere except to us for post-war economic alliances. This amendment might even instigate other nations to give us notice of their determination to cancel their reciprocal trade agreements with us so as to leave them free to discriminate against us. I believe that the adoption of this amendment would weaken both our wartime and post-war position without a sufficiently offsetting advantage to justify that effect.

Third. The benefits to be gained by the adoption of the committee amendment are of little if any value to our Nation. Three questions are sufficient to analyze them.

Does the committee amendment add a new right of termination of the trade agreements to those now held by the United States as a party to them? The answer is "No." The right of the United States to terminate these agreements is fixed by the terms of the agreements themselves and naturally cannot in good conscience be altered without the consent of the other contracting party. Furthermore, the United States already has ample right under the terms of these agreements to terminate any or all of them on not more than 6 months' notice after the expiration of the first 3 years. All the agreements now in effect have either passed this 3-year mark or in all probability will have passed that mark long before the end of the war. The committee amendment, accordingly, does not attempt to increase the right of the United States in existing agreements as such. It deals merely with what agency, as between the Congress and the President, shall speak for the United States.

As to the possibility that new reciprocal trade agreements with new lives of 3 years, or new lives based upon the pending amendment, will be made in the midst of the war, I believe it is highly unlikely, either on our part or on the part of other nations, that any such agreements can be secured.

In view of the close relationship that must exist between the administration and Congress with respect to wartime policies, the way to approach any such possibility, I believe, is by direct and frank understanding on that specific point.

The administration and the Congress have a joint constitutional responsibility for our foreign-trade policies, and if there is any doubt about action that is likely to be taken during the war which might substantially change our trade relations and war policies, it should be met by direct action preventing those steps being taken, or being taken without advice by and concurrence of the Congress. The doubt is certainly not resolved by the cumbersome and extremely tardy control presented by the committee amendment. The committee amendment merely provides a way, a means, to cut down agreements at that highly uncertain and remote period when the President shall have proclaimed that hostilities have ceased in the great war which we are fighting all around the world, and which may continue for years to come.

My second question as to the effect of the committee amendment is this: Does the committee amendment add any new power to the President's right to terminate the reciprocal trade agreements on behalf of the United States? The answer is, "No." The President already has the recognized right to terminate the agreements on behalf of the United States on not more than 6 months' notice after the expiration of the first 3 years of the respective agreements. In fact, it has been suggested that the committee amendment, instead of expanding the President's authority, might by implication repeal his general right to terminate the agreements, and might limit that right of termination to the one occasion with which the committee amendment especially deals, namely, that which will arise 6 months after the cessation of hostilities—a period which is decidedly more distant.

My third question as to the effect of the amendment is this: Does the committee amendment add any new power to the Congress, on behalf of the United States, to terminate the reciprocal trade agreements? The answer is that perhaps it does, but probably it does not. In view of the fact that Congress has not heretofore taken any action depriving itself of its right to terminate such agreements by joint resolution, it presumably retains that right. If the Congress can now, by the committee amendment, give itself the right to terminate all reciprocal trade agreements six months after the war, then no doubt Congress could by direct action terminate the same agreements at any time now, on not more than six months' notice, provided only that, in accordance with the terms of the agreements, the first three years of their respective lives should have expired. Here, also, it may be suggested that the adoption of the commitee amendment might by implication limit the right of Congress to terminate trade agreements so that hereafter such right could be exercised only six months after the cessation of hostilities. It may be argued that the specification by Congress of its right so to proceed at that time indicates recognition by Congress that it would not so proceed at any other time; otherwise there would be no reason for Congress to specify the procedure stated in the committee amendment.

In any event, the added right of Congress to terminate trade agreements in the manner specified in the committee amendment is of such extremely limited value that it can hardly justify the sacrifice of any strength of our position in the war to acquire those rights.

Let us further examine the effect of the committee amendment. First of all, if the action is to be taken under the committee amendment by joint resolution, the joint resolution which would result would require the signature of the President to make it effective, or the resolution would require a two-thirds vote of both Houses to override his veto of it. The likelihood of having the Congress vote to override his veto in such a case is sufficiently remote as to indicate small likelihood of action by Congress under such circumstances. Therefore the matter remains largely a subject of Presidential action.

Second, under the committee amendment the right of Congress to terminate reciprocal trade agreements could be exercised only if the President in his discretion had proclaimed the cessation of hostilities in the present war. This leaves the time of action to a substantial degree at the discretion of the President.

Third, the opportunity for Congress to tereminate the reciprocal trade agreements under the committee amendment could occur only after the cessation of hostilities in the present war, as fixed by the proclamation of the President. This presumably means, therefore, the present war with Germany, Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Japan. It is hardly likely that the much-hoped-for cessation of hostilities against all those enemies will occur before June 12, 1945. Yet, on June 12, 1945, the right of the President to enter into reciprocal trade agreements under this general law will again expire, as it is now about to expire on June 12, 1943. Accordingly, the committee amendment could better be presented 2 years from now, than now. In so doing, the amendment would avoid the exceptional difficulties which are presented by its consideration at this particular moment, and many things bearing on the need for it may well have been determined before June 12, 1945.

Under these circumstances, the benefits, if any, which would flow from the committee amendment are so slight that they are readily outweighed by the detriment arising from it.

Finally, my fourth reason for opposing the committee amendment is that it offers no constructive alternative for what it would destroy. The amendment unnecessarily expresses a threat of possible and remote action to terminate all reciprocal trade agreement 6 months after the hostilities in the present war have ceased, and to do so by joint action of the Congress, even over Presidential veto. The amendment unnecessarily emphasizes an unlikely and unfortunate possibility of disagreement within our Government. It voices a congressional threat, and accompanies it by no declaration of congressional policy either for or against the principle of economic international collaboration as opposed to economic international warfare. It overemphasizes the possibility of a difference of policy between the Congress and the President. It emphasizes the ultimate responsibility of Congress in case of such a disagreement. If Congress proposes to emphasize and exercise its inherent powers and to act in opposition to the executive branch of the Government, it certainly should do so only under unusual circumstances; and, when doing so, it owes it to the country and to the world to express on its own account that quality of leadership which is essential to the discharge of so great a responsibility. A threat without the accompaniment of a clear, constructive alternative course of action does much harm, and leads nowhere.

I believe that the committee amendment, if accepted, would thus turn out to be an expensive one-way ticket to nowhere, and would fall far short of justifying the price paid for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it is my intention to support the joint resolution as passed by the House, but with the Senate committee amendment definitely providing that any agreements made automatically becomes revocable 6 months after the close of hostilities. This does not mean that a single agreement will be revoked, but it makes it possible to do so if conditions following the war should so require. The governments with whom we contract have the same option, and it may be to their interest to want to change certain trade provisions. The suggested arrangement is not a one-sided one.

With the adoption of the committee amendment, I think it is unnecessary to decide on the constitutionality of the original act. Nearly everyone is in agreement that the act itself is of little effect during the war, for practically all available shipping is used to move material purchased by Government agencies and therefore the movement of materials is not affected by tariff or other restrictions which affect normal commercial trade. During the war there can be little if any commercial trading. Without the committee amendment attached, I shall vote against the extension of the original act.

Following the war, conditions may make it desirable for either or both contracting governments to want some change. We have certainly been friendly enough in our trade relations with all other nations during the past, and I see no cause for uneasiness on the part of our good neighbors, if the committee amendment becomes a part of the Reciprocal Trade Act. We ask for ourselves no right which does not automatically become their right, and, frankly, it may be our neighbors who will want to renegotiate the trade agreements that are now or may hereafter become operative.

It is easily possible, in fact, almost certain, that a fundamental overhauling of our whole foreign trade policy may be necessary to meet post-war conditions. The war has hastened the development of the small, backward nations, especially those of South America. They may receive a tremendous influx of people from the European war-torn countries—people of talent, skilled in the sciences, leaders in the professions and in business, including international trade. The United States and other nations have developed substitutes for rubber, silk, tin, and many other things, directly affecting the methods and problems of trade between countries. I doubt if we as a Nation will want to scrap our synthetic rubber plants when war ceases. Likewise, I doubt if other nations who have developed synthetic products, essential to their safety, will want to scrap their plants and again depend on natural materials available only by ocean delivery from points thousands of miles distant. The passage of House Joint Resolution No. 111, including the committee amendment, will harm no one, and will give protection to each contracting party alike. Existing agreements may continue for years; and, again, if either party discovers that post-war conditions have changed to the extent that new agreements should be executed, the change becomes possible within a reasonable time, 6 months following the close of hostilities.

Proponents of the joint resolution have stated that "the renewal of the trade agreements program is essential for the maintenance of employment and business activity after the war." To this I cannot agree, for certainly a given amount of energy advantageously employed at home supplying our own needs is just as useful economically as the same amount of energy applied in the making of goods to be shipped abroad, particularly when there is a question as to whether we can receive payment therefor without the extension of credit in the form of direct loans or through some lend-lease gymnastics. There is no use going into detail in proof of this statement. I will, however, quote from a reliable authority.

An examination of the record will show that despite all our attempts to increase imports through the reciprocal trade agreements, yet in the period of 1936–1940 our merchandise imports averaged about 3.5 percent of our national income produced, as compared with about 5.5 percent in earlier years when we were supposed to be laboring under unconscionably high tariffs.

From this it is easily seen that any benefit obtained from the operation of this act has been largely psychological, rather than material.

However, none of us can tell what the future trend may be; hence I wish to protect the interests of the United States, the Constitution of which I have sworn to protect and preserve.

I do not like the trend of affairs during the past 10 years as it affects the economy of our own people, and I hesitate further to place in jeopardy any of the rights and liberties of the people of America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks an editorial appearing a few days ago in a Nebraska newspaper published at Fremont, Nebr. The editorial is entitled "Lord Help Us." While some of the remarks contained therein are not entirely apropos of the subject under discussion, I think many of the thoughts presented are directly applicable.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fremont (Nebr.) Guide and Tribune]

LORD HELP US

This is a bold and broad statement, but a considered one:

Lord help the United States if the New Deal is allowed to remain in power through the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt for a fourth term or the election of one of his ardent followers.

By that statement no criticism is implied of President Roosevelt's conduct of the war on the actual fighting fronts. We are doing splendidly considering the slow start we had.

But his command of the war does not make Roosevelt indispensable. It is highly probable that there are many men in the United States who could have done as well, or better.

We reiterate our original statement: Lord help the United States if the New Deal is allowed to remain in power.

For there is every indication that the New Deal plans to extend itself—even going further with some of its theories than it has at home—all over the world, and at the expense of the people of the United States.

There is every indication that the New Deal is casting Uncle Sam in the role of the great sucker. He's played that role before, but never before on the scale which the New Deal contemplates.

There is every indication that the New Deal is setting up Uncle Sam to feed the world, to clothe the world, to give social security to all the world—and at no cost to the rest of the world, but at the sole expense of the people of the United States.

Temporary relief to starving countries must, of course, be given as rapidly as we free them from the Nazis, but indications say that that isn't all the New Dealers have in mind. They are planning to set up the United States as a permanent relief agency.

Now, all this would be enough if it was only going to cost some of our hard-earned dollars. But it will cost much more. It will cost us much of the good that will be needed at home, much of our industry, much of our agriculture, and much of our natural resources.

The New Deal planners practically admit they have something like this in mind. Paul Appleby, chief of the United States delegation to the "give-it-away" food conference at Hot Springs, says rationing must continue for years after the war ends.

What it all boils down to is this: The New Deal plans to raise the living standard of the rest of the world a few degrees while cutting the standard of the United States at least, and probably more than, half.

Why is the New Deal planning all this? Well, it's possible that our New Deal do-gooders are just so full of the milk of human kindness that they can't help themselves. But it is also possible that they can see Roosevelt not only as President of the United States but as president of the world.

Whatever the reasoning—or lack of it—behind the New Deal's grandiose schemes, the outcome isn't hard to see.

The other countries of the world naturally will accept all that we given them. Why not? It won't cost them anything because we here in the United States will be footing the bills, just as we've been footing the bills for idealistic but foolish experiments ever since 1933.

And when those countries have taken all they want, they'll tell poor old open-handed, but ragged, flat-broke, and flat-bellied Uncle Sam to go fly his kite.

And the better world for which we are allegedly fighting may have become a reality, but our own home will have become a hellhole.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, in conclusion, based on the latest estimates, the United States has about 6 percent of the world's population and possesses about 30 percent of the world's wealth. Around 1930 we had about 35 percent of the total wealth. We earned about 36 percent of the total income in 1940, against about 42 percent in 1930. It is estimated that Lend-Lease will total about $100,000,000,000 by the time the war ends. That is nearly one-third our total wealth as a nation. I think it is about time carefully to consider legislation in the light of how it may ultimately affect this Nation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, this debate on a third extension of the act authorizing reciprocal trade agreements has been remarkable in that it has been a classic illustration of the Shakespearean expression about those who "keep the promise to our ear and break it to our hopes."

This is the fourth time that this proposition has been before the Congress, essentially in identical form.

It is said that on the eve of ordering the memorable and heroic charge by General Pickett's division at the battle of Gettysburg, General Lee said, "We have tried their right; we have tried their left; and now I am going to break their center."

In this case the opponents of the principle of reciprocal trade agreements tried the center in 1934. They tried the right in 1937. They tried the left in 1940; and they are now unwilling to make an outright attack at all. They are trying to win this battle by subterfuge.

As I have listened to the various proposals for crippling and emasculating amendments, by those who profess unwillingness to oppose the principle of the reciprocal trade agreements, I am reminded of nothing so much as the old Biblical story of Joab and Abner, in II Samuel, chapter 3. We all remember the war that existed between the House of David and the House of Saul. Joab was the general of the House of David. Abner was the general of the House of Saul. Abner went down and made peace with King David, but Joab, David's own general, was not satisfied with that peace, and he sent word to Abner that he would like to have him come up to Hebron and have a peaceful meeting with him. When Abner got there Joab told him to step into the gateway for a quiet talk, and when he got in he took him by the coat lapel and said, "How is it with thee, my brother?" And, as the Bible states, he smote him under the fifth rib, laid his innards open, and Abner fell down and died.

So we find the situation today, Mr. President, among those who are absolutely unwilling to make an open attack upon the principle of the reciprocal trade agreements. We find the statement that they are willing to reenact that act with just one little amendment, or another little amendment, or a third little amendment—either the Danaher amendment, the O'Mahoney amendment, or the Maloney amendment. Some have said, "We believe that the act is unconstitutional." The other day my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] said, "I have grave constitutional doubts." But those doubts could be resolved by "this little inconsequential amendment," or by the other little inconsequential amendment, or some third little inconsequental amendment, any one of which would completely destroy the force and effect of the whole reciprocal trade agreements program.

When I have listened to such arguments, Mr. President, I have been reminded of nothing so much as the very vivid story I heard told on the floor of the Senate the other day by the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. He said that one of his old constituents went fishing and caught a fine big succulent catfish and was about to prepare the catfish for cooking. A catfish is rather slippery on the under side, and the old man had some trouble getting his knife into the catfish. The catfish was flipping around on this side and flopping around on the other side. The old fellow said, "Mr. Catfish, what is the matter with you. Why don't you lie still? Don't you realize that nothing ain't going to happen to you? Don't you know that you is in the hands of a friend? You are perfectly safe, Mr. Catfish? I ain't gwine to do nothing offensive to you. All I am gwine to do is gut you." [Laughter.] That is the purpose of the amendments which have been offered to the reciprocal trade agreements joint resolution.

Mr. President, it is very seldom indeed that I take the trouble to read or refer to a newspaper editorial on a question under consideration in this body. However, there was an editorial in the Baltimore Sun of Thursday, May 27, which seemed to me to be so succinct, so logical, and so unanswerable that I wish to read it. It contains a discussion of the speech of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on the day before. I believe that it deserves to be read into the RECORD, and I desire to read it at this time. The editorial is headed "Hiding in the wood pile."

Let me say, Mr. President, that I am certain that I do not need to say to my distinguished friend from Michigan that there is no Member of this body with whom I have ever come in contact for whose talents and character I have a higher admiration than I have for his, and there is no one for whom I have a warmer personal affection and respect.

The editorial reads as follows:

Senator VANDENBERG, who opened the Senate debate for the opposition to the trade-agreements bill, was too clever to attack the bill directly. Again and again he professed his devotion to the principle of reciprocity.

I may say in passing, Mr. President, that some of the most eloquent speeches which have ever been made in this body in favor of executive discretion in the matter of tariff regulation were made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] when a comparatively new Member of this body in connection with the flexible provisions of the Smoot-Hawley bill and the so-called Collier-Harrison Act, which was designed to restrict and repeal that discretion or to subject it to congressional approval.

I continue to read from the editorial in the Baltimore Sun.

He argued, however, that the agreements already in existence might interfere with our freedom of negotiation at the peace table, and he insisted that to keep our policy flexible we must leave the way open for Congress to reconsider the trade-agreements program when the war ends.

With this in mind, he supported the Danaher amendment, which provides that Congress by joint resolution may denounce all trade agreements within 6 months from the end of the war. By this means, Mr. VANDENBERG contended, we shall avoid sending "our negotiators to the peace table—there to meet free agents of every other power on earth—with their hands tied behind their backs by presently negotiated and permanently frozen trade agreements, no matter how nobly meditated."

This argument is vitiated by two obvious misstatements of fact. It is not true, as Mr. VANDENBERG implies, that a renewal of the Trade Agreements Act will freeze all existing trade agreements. The fact is, and Mr. VANDENBERG ought to know this if he does not, that the renewal of the act is necessary to keep the trade agreements fluid. Many of the agreements have already been amended at least once, and those with Cuba and Canada have been amended several times. While the Trade Agreements Act remains in force such amendments are always possible. In implying that the pacts would be frozen if the act were renewed without the passage of the Danaher amendment, therefore, Mr. VANDENBERG is giving a false impression.

A second misstatement of fact is to be found in Mr. VANDENBERG's charge that our agents at the peace table will have their hands tied while the agents of other powers will be free. The Senator from Michigan must think his hearers are very stupid indeed if he really wants them to believe that we would be bound by the trade agreements while the other signatories would not be. The truth is that to the extent that the trade agreements bind one, they bind all.

The principal sophistry in Mr. VANDENBERG's argument, however, does not appear on the face of his speech. He says the Danaher amendment will free our hands to follow a sound commercial policy at the end of the war. What he fails to say, however, is that if the existing trade agreements are denounced the Hawley-Smoot tariff comes back into full force and effect.

Mr. President, I cannot too strongly emphasize the last statement in the editorial which I have read. I will read the statement again.

He says the Danaher amendment will free our hands to follow a sound commercial policy at the end of the war. What he fails to say, however, is that if the existing trade agreements are denounced the Hawley-Smoot tariff—comes back into full force and effect.

Of infamous memory—

I continue reading from the editorial:

This is the concealed Abyssinian in the wood pile which the supporters of the Danaher amendment have carefully built up. Should this amendment be passed, and should the trade agreements be denounced under its terms, the Smoot-Hawley tariff, many of the excesses of which have been pared down by the Hull program, would be automatically restored. Worse still, the high tariffs which foreign countries erected in retaliation for our passage of the Smoot-Hawley tariff would be automatically restored at the same time.

I should add to the statement which I have read from the editorial in the Baltimore Sun, Mr. President, that not only would the iniquitous tariffs in foreign countries barring the products of our farmers and factories from the markets of the world be automatically restored, but the infamous and iniquitous system of restrictions and discriminations in matters of exchange, and other commercial restrictions of every sort, largely brought into being by retaliation against our short-sighted and benighted tariff policy, would also be brought automatically back into effect. I conclude reading the editorial in the Baltimore Sun, as follows:

To do that would deal foreign trade a paralyzing blow at the very outset of the post-war period. Such a procedure would not free our hands, as Mr. VANDENBERG naively asks us to believe. On the contrary, it would tie our hands to a far greater degree than now, and it would put international trade the world over into the same strait jacket which caused it to wither away in the early thirties. This would not only tie our hands, but it would tie our trade and invite an economic calamity.

We hope that the Senate will think this issue through and see that a vote for the Danaher amendment is a vote looking to restoration of the Hawley-Smoot tariff. It is not a vote to free our commercial policy but to shackle it.

Mr. President, with all the respect which I have expressed, and now feel for the distinguished Senator from Michigan, I thought as I listened to his eloquent—and he is always eloquent—remarks the other day, and as I have read them over in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that in his statements of the issues involved in the pending joint resolution, the distinguished Senator has been uncommonly contradictory for him, and unusually careless for a man of his meticulous care in stating issues. In particular has it seemed to me to be true in his championing of the amendment which would permit Congress, by joint resolution, to terminate any or all trade agreements 6 months after the ending of hostilities.

At one place the distinguished Senator from Michigan argued that the Danaher amendment is absolutely inconsequential because it amounts to nothing more than a restatement of the constitutional power of Congress which exists at this time. I think that is true; I think it is unquestionable. But a few minutes later the distinguished Senator from Michigan attributed such tremendous and outstanding importance to the Danaher amendment that he stated that the adoption of the amendment would resolve very serious constitutional doubts which the Senator from Michigan professes to entertain as to the constitutionality of this proposed law.

Mr. President, if there is any doubt as to the constitutionality of the trade agreements act—which I do not believe, and do not think is even debatable—it seems inconceivable to me that such doubt could be resolved by a restatement of existing law which the Senator from Michigan insists the Danaher amendment practically amounts to. So the only conclusion that could be drawn from the argument of the able Senator from Michigan is that either the proposed amendment has some sinister hidden power—which has not yet been openly claimed for it, even by its authors—or that the constitutional objections of which the Senator from Michigan has spoken so appealingly are singularly weak and unconvincing. It matters very little to me upon which horn of this dilemma the distinguished Senator from Michigan and other supporters of the act may choose to hang this strange doctrine, but certainly they cannot have it both ways.

The Senator from Michigan, as well as other supporters of the proposed amendment, cannot eat their cake and keep it too. If the amendment does not mean anything, if it is merely a restatement of existing law, if its only purpose can be offensive to the nations with whom we might like to enter into trade agreements, and create in their minds an impression of our insincerity, then it should not be agreed to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield very gladly to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I dislike to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am happy to be interrupted at any time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not think it is fair to interrupt the Senator while he is speaking under limited time. Possibly later in the afternoon I may wish more extensively to comment on the amazing perversion which my able friend is presenting to the Senate. But in this instance I think he should be a little more scrupulous in stating the position I undertook to present regarding the constitutional question.

I am sure I never said that the Danaher amendment would meet my constitutional objection. I think the Senator will find that what I said was that, so far as I was concerned, during the pendency of the war crisis I was willing to suspend all my previously expressed doubts regarding the subject if we could simply be sure that the entire program could optionally pass in review after the termination of the war. Is not that what I said?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to read exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly do not wish to misquote the Senator from Michigan. Without quoting him directly, I was giving the impression his remarks made on me when I heard them, and when I read them again in the RECORD no later than this morning. The Senator from Michigan began his remarks with these words:

> Mr. President, I regret that the measure providing for the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act could not have been presented in a form which could have produced substantial agreement at this particular time for the sake of its impact upon the general war situation. Some of us earnestly sought to create this result in spite of our predilections. I think the extension of the act with the one single amendment asserting the constitutional rights of Congress in a modest way, avoiding all reasonable offense, would have achieved this desirable conclusion. I think it should have achieved this conclusion if we could have been dealing with reasonable men. I think it has been a mistake on the part of the present administration to resist this useful and constructive achievement, and I think that when the Senate has approved the pending amendment the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act will still stand in a position of effective and formidable endorsement.

I shall not undertake to read his whole speech, but the Senator went on to express very grave constitutional doubt about this matter, and stated that, while he had entertained very great constitutional doubts, nevertheless, the adoption of a simple amendment would enable him to vote for the joint resolution. The point I am making, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, is that if the amendment, as was asserted and as has been claimed repeatedly both in the committee and on this floor is nothing on earth except a restatement of existing law—and that has not been seriously questioned, for I take it the Congress does have the right at the present time under this act, by joint resolution, to repeal all the trade agreements law or to abrogate any particular trade agreement, and that under existing law the President has the same power—then I say that if the Danaher amendment means nothing except a brief restatement of existing law, then there is certainly nothing in the amendment to resolve any constitutional doubt as to the constitutionality of the whole act and the whole system.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TUNNELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit that the Senator has read nothing to justify his repetition of the position which he previously erroneously attributed to me. I did not undertake, for a moment, to say that the Danaher amendment was an answer to the fundamental constitutional challenge which many persons, including the Senator from Michigan, feel in respect to this legislation, but what I did say was, and what I now repeat is, that I recognize that we are in a state of war; I recognize that during a state of war we have to deal with public questions often on a different basis than in normal times; and I said, and I repeat, that, so far as I was concerned, if the Danaher amendment, which in my view simply notifies the world that there is an ultimate congressional authority, were adopted, then, as a matter of good faith, I would suspend all other doubts, and I would not myself renew any of my previous constitutional objections, although I added that I certainly would have to vote for any such amendments if they were offered provided the Danaher amendment was not adopted. That is a totally different thing, I submit to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator can put any construction he pleases on his remarks, and I am entitled to make any comment on his position, and that is what I am doing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not complain of that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am simply pointing out that if the act is unconstitutional, it ought not to be passed, and if it is not unconstitutional nothing in it whatever would be changed by the adoption of the Danaher amendment except our situation with regard to other countries of the world. In other words, if the only purpose of the Danaher amendment is to put every other nation in the world on notice, possibly unfairly, possibly without justification, that we are not entirely sincere in this matter, that we intend to abrogate these treaties 6 months after the war is over, then they will never then be willing to deal with us on any such basis.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Illinois permit me to conclude inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri referred to me?

Mr. LUCAS. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I totally disagree with what the Senator has just said regarding the matter of notice we are giving to the world. I do not want to argue with him unless he is connecting his statement in some way with my position. What he has suggested certainly is diametrically opposite to the purpose I find in the Danaher amendment, and I simply say in one or two sentences to the Senator that I think the notice we would give the world through the Danaher amendment is that there is a constitutional authority already resident in the Congress to revoke trade agreements, but, so far as the text of the existing trade agreements is concerned, the only reference is to notice by the President; and I am saying that if the world thinks the trade agreements made under this act are subject only to revocation upon notice by the President the world is totally mistaken, and I am therefore believing very sincerely that the best possible way to insure post-war good-faith relationships is to anticipate post-war candor now by asserting textually through the Danaher amendment what I believe and what the Senator from Missouri believes to be the proper authority of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, the reason for the provision in existing law is very simple. The power of the Congress of the United States to repeal an act or to modify an act or to change or to abrogate one of these agreements by a joint resolution either signed by the President or by a joint resolution passed by a two-thirds majority of both Houses over the President's veto is inherent, and did not require any statement in a statute passed by Congress. The authority of the President to terminate one of these agreements after 3 years on 6 months' notice or, in fact, to abrogate it at any time, is not inherent in the power of the President himself; it is one of the powers specifically delegated by law, and, therefore, was properly included in the limitation of the law.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me that if it were desired to attempt to nullify the Trade Agreement Act as would be done by the Danaher amendment, it would have been much better to offer a straight-out repeal of the act and then the country would know what we are voting on?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think so, and I will say to the Senator from Illinois, as one who has very ardently and very conscientiously supported this act both in its inception in 1934, and its continuation in 1937 and in 1940, that if any such crippling amendment as the Danaher amendment, the O'Mahoney amendment, or the Maloney amendment comes out of the conference report on this matter, assuming it reaches that stage, then I, as a supporter of the principle of reciprocal trade agreements, believe it would be very much better to let the thing die and I intend to vote against any such conference report.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to conclude as briefly as possible. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator from Michigan and those who are supporting the Danaher amendment that, in view of the infinitesimal advantages even planned for the Danaher amendment in the way of a restatement of an undoubted congressional power and privilege, as against the great advantages that inhere in cooperation in international affairs, the Senator from Michigan might very well have pondered the remarks of one of his favorite prophets whom he quoted so eloquently in his speech the other day when he said:

> The imprudence of posing the biggest issues on a test of this small issue is evident.

Mr. President, I merely wish to say in closing that the Reciprocal Trade Act was originally passed as the only possible, practicable means of providing the machinery for the whole world, not only the United States, but for the whole world, to work out of the morass of despair into which we had been plunged largely through our own initiative, in passing the Fordney-McCumber bill and the Smoot-Hawley bill, followed by retaliation on the part of every other nation in the world, not only in tariff rates, not only in prohibitive barriers, but through vicious quota systems, and exchange regulations, which paralyzed the international trade of the world.

Congress could not pass an act to correct that situation. Congress had been largely responsible for creating the condition, and it had passed out of the power of Congress to correct it. Therefore Congress started in on the program of laying down the broad principles upon which its agents should act—and in this case the Executive is nothing but an agent of the Congress—and then permitting the Executive to proceed, within the limits prescribed by law, for certain specified purposes, for benefiting our foreign trade, and making the best trades possible with other countries, not only as to tariff barriers, but economic restrictions of other sorts.

I feel that the results of that policy have not been as immediate and as great as I had hoped. That was possible because the situation was extremely complex, and only 5 short years intervened between the time when Congress acted to set up this authority and the outbreak of the war in Europe, which almost completely hamstrung economic relations over the world. But it is the only effective machinery existing in the world today for economic cooperation rather than economic warfare.

I urge every Senator to consider the alternative to the renewal of this program without crippling amendments. The alternative is to revert immediately to the prohibitive provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which is so infamous that no Senator will stand on this floor to defend it, and not only to revert to that but to revert to the barriers to American trade which were set up by other nations in retaliation for our short-sighted tariff policy. So I urge, with every fiber of my being, that the Congress pass the pending measure for extension of the Trade Agreements Act without crippling amendments, and so maintain machinery which is the only hope of economic trade relations by cooperation instead of by retaliation and warfare throughout the world.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I shall vote for the reciprocal trade program and its continuance for the reasons I shall state. I wish to express my confidence in Secretary Hull, who was responsible for the inauguration of the program, which has been so helpful and so effective on behalf of the people of the United States.

I think it is desirable to continue in existence this sound principle of international cooperation, in the interest of unity in our war effort, and in the interest of a secure peace when the war shall have ended, and continued prosperity to the American people. I think it would be very desirable to have the affirmative vote on the pending measure sufficiently large to indicate to everyone on earth that it was a bipartisan vote; that it was not a matter of politics, because these agreements have had the merit of being workable, and they have been helpful to the people of the United States.

I think it would be a mistake to adopt crippling amendments, and I agree with the Senator from Missouri that Congress has not given up its authority to do away with the trade agreements by congressional resolution. Amendments such as that offered by the Senator from Connecticut in my opinion do not offer anything, and certainly Congress has not given up its authority, except in those instances where it delegates to the President certain power to act as the agent of the Congress.

I intend to support the present program because, as I have said, I am confident that Mr. Hull, our Secretary of State, has done a magnificent piece of work; that his work is entitled to a vote of confidence on the part of the Senate of the United States, and that our approval would give to the American people, and to the people in the countries with whom we deal, a feeling that we mean to follow this course not merely during the war but in the interest of peace and security after the war has ended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I reserve the right to conclude, of course, and I defer to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. DANAHER. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia; I do not know what he said.

Mr. GEORGE. I said I reserved the right to conclude, briefly, and I defer to the Senator for the present.

Mr. DANAHER. I should like very much to have the Senator from Georgia proceed. It is true that as chairman of the committee he reported the pending amendment on behalf of the committee, pursuant to a vote which the committee itself took directing that he take that step, but the fact remains that the majority of the committee have proposed the committee amendment which comprises the pending question, and certainly under all our normal intercourse and dealings in the handling of matters before the Senate, the proponents of a proposition have been given the prerogative of closing the debate. I know of no reason why that usual and customary procedure should be dispensed with.

Mr. GEORGE. I am ready to vote, Mr. President. If the Senator does not care to argue the matter, I am perfectly willing to have the vote.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia if I am not entirely correct in my understanding that in a situation such as that which now prevails the proponents of an amendment normally would conclude the debate?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think so. I am certainly not conscious of doing anything unethical. As chairman of the committee I reported the joint resolution. I asked the majority, who voted in the amendment, to report the joint resolution and take the burden, and that they declined to do so, and I think I have a right to conclude the debate. But I am perfectly willing to vote at this time, if the Senator does not desire to speak.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator from Georgia how long he intends to speak, if he does conclude the debate?

Mr. GEORGE. I have but 34 minutes, and I do not think I shall take more than 15 or 20 minutes. I merely wish to state my position very briefly. I shall not delay the vote very much by a speech.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I do not see a sufficient number of Senators on the floor at the moment to carry the committee amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	George	Overton
Andrews	Gerry	Pepper

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DANAHER. How much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And the Senator from Georgia has 33 minutes.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, there certainly has been much misapprehension as to both the purpose and the intendment of the committee amendment, if one is to place reliance on the sort of utterance which the last few hours have given. We have pending before us a proposal which has already passed the House to extend the act of June 12, 1934, as amended, for an additional 2 years. If we were not to extend the act at all, every trade agreement which today is outstanding would continue in full force and effect. Those which had originally been written for 3 years would continue automatically under the 1934 act, which provides that they shall continue, subject only to 6 months' notice of their discontinuance to be given by either country. Those which have been agreed upon in 1941 or 1942 would continue, not only throughout their specified lives, but thereafter indefinitely, subject to termination upon 6 months' notice. At this point in our thinking, Mr. President, we should look at the original 1934 act to ascertain just exactly what the statute authorized as to the life of a trade agreement and we find in section 2 (b) the following language:

> Every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to this act shall be subject to termination, upon due notice to the foreign government concerned, at the end of not more than 3 years from the date on which the agreement comes into force, and, if not then terminated, shall be subject to termination thereafter upon not more than 6 months' notice.

Mr. President, interestingly enough, the act is completely silent as to who is to give the notice of termination in the event that the United States chooses to terminate. So the Committee on Finance, before reporting the joint resolution coming to us from the House, first proposed to amend the pending measure—the proposal could be said to be an amendment to existing law—by providing that the notice of termination is to be given either by the President of the United States acting by himself, whenever he decides to give notice to terminate, or by the President acting pursuant to a joint resolution which the Congress may pass.

In other words, Mr. President, with respect to the pending amendment, in no way whatever would the President's power, if he has any, be interfered with. Quite the contrary, the Committee on Finance in its majority amendment says that whatever the President's power might have been, it would still continue; whatever the President's power in the future may be, we would still accord it to him. But we would also say that at a date not earlier than 6 months following the cessation of hostilities in the present war, the Congress of the United States might pass a joint resolution calling upon the President to terminate an improvident trade agreement.

At that moment, of course, the President of the United States would have the power to veto the joint resolution passed by the Congress, if he disagreed with the action of the Congress. Thereupon, it would become incumbent upon the Congress, if it were to succeed in its endeavor, to override the veto by a two-thirds vote of both Houses. That is the situation which as a matter of law is said by opponents of the committee amendment to spell disaster for the United States. That contention is perfectly absurd, it seems to me.

Mr. President, while the amendment has been referred to as the Danaher amendment, there is no reason in the world why it should be dignified, especially by the allocation of my name to it. Seriously, let it be known that the majority group in the Finance Committee caused draft after draft of the proposed language to be written by various members.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield for a question, not for a statement.

Mr. TOBEY. I think the Senator will accept the statement—30 seconds long, only—which I propose to make.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well.

Mr. TOBEY. If what my friend the Senator from Connecticut has said is correct, the allocation of his name to the amendment not only would dignify it, but certainly would vitalize it.

Mr. DANAHER. I appreciate even the 20 seconds to which the Senator limited himself, and I thank him.

Mr. President, the intention of the drafters of the amendment was to make as little change as possible in existing law. Even the very phraseology, the very nouns, the very prepositions and clauses of the proposed committee amendment follow exactly the language of the original act, with a slight interpolation. It should be recalled that since the original act had provided that every foreign trade agreement concluded pursuant to the act shall be subject to termination as therein stated, it follows, as a matter of statutory construction and as a matter of treaty interpretation, Mr. President, that that provision was automatically and necessarily written into every such trade agreement.

Mr. President, the committee amendment would say that every trade agreement concluded hereafter, over the life of the act, as extended, shall automatically include as a statutory clause not only section 2 (b) of the 1934 act, but also the statement of a power in Congress to call for a termination; and with design, Mr. President, we said, "Every foreign trade agreement"—not all foreign trade agreements—"shall be subject to termination."

In other words, "every" is used in the sense of "each"; and it would require 31 separate joint resolutions to terminate the 31 trade agreemens at any future date, were Congress to attempt to exercise the power, so reserved.

Moreover, the language in line 9 designedly says——

Every foreign-trade agreement concluded in accordance with the provisions of said act as amended—

The use of the words "in accordance with" was designed to incorporate by reference all of the existing statute, with its limitations, its authority, its powers, and its rights—whatever the statutory language affords.

So, Mr. President, stripped of all its technicalities, it could have read that—

Every foreign-trade agreement concluded in accordance with the provisions of said act as amended shall, 6 months after the cessation of hostilities in the present war, as fixed by proclamation of the President, be subject to termination pursuant to joint resolution of the Congress or by the President.

We did not adopt that form, simply that the committee language might conform as closely as possible to, and be entirely consonant with, existing law.

Mr. President, if we ask, Why is it of importance or interest that we bring back some possible measure of control to the Congress with reference to these trade agreements, we are faced with this situation: If we should extend the life of the authority over the next 2 years for the President to conclude new agreements, he would, under the original act, be in a position to bind the United States for 3 years. We would stand committed. If the war should end within that 3-year period, even though Congress may technically have the right to repudiate an agreement which we have authorized our President to make, we most assuredly would not wish to stand at the bar of international good morals and leave our country and our President open to condemnation for having repudiated an agreement, even though we should find it to our national interest to do so.

Consequently, Mr. President, if we at this time add to the series of escape clauses provided in the 1934 act which operate for the benefit of the United States, and now give notice to every country which concludes an agreement over the period of the extended life of the act that the President himself may terminate an improvident agreement, or may be called upon by Congress to do so, every nation will be put on notice at the outset. That course would preserve, rather than destroy, the good faith and morals of the position of the United States at the bar of world appraisal.

There are other phases, economic and legal, which justify this step. One of them is to be found in the statement of Mr. Elmer Davis, which was made in Chicago on April 27. I quote from the Associated Press account of the utterance of the head of the Office of War Information.

If it comes to the unconditional surrender of our enemies, there may simply be occupation of the defeated countries. There are a lot of policies which may be worked out in practice instead of conference. Nobody can see what the peace negotiations will be.

He pointed out that the Allies may dispense with a peace parley entirely. That utterance from the head of the Office of War Information is in line with other utterances which have hitherto emanated from the State Department, that the so-called peace negotiations may be deferred for a period of years. Over that entire period the United States would be helpless during the stated life of each agreement in the face of the position which we would otherwise have authorized our President to take if we do not now give to the Congress an opportunity, definitely reserved, to bring back for review and examination whatever trade agreements he might conclude under the act if extended.

It is because of that situation, Mr. President, that the people of the United States are entitled to the reasonable protection which the committee amendment would give.

At Hot Springs at this very moment there is in conference a group which is discussing the world movement of foods in the post-war period. We were told at the very outset that American interests would not be committed, and that the interests of no other nation would be committed at that conference. We were told that it is purely exploratory. If it be so for what reason is it that the delegates are not committing either their nations or our own at the food conference at Hot Springs? Clearly because they cannot possibly foresee what conditions in the future are to be, and they so stated. Why should we pass this joint resolution without amendment, and authorize trade agreements which may bind our Nation over the post-war period?

Mr. President, on or about the 4th of March Mr. Morgenthau, Secretary of the Treasury, proposed to 34 nations a form of international currency stabilization. After that proposal had been considered for about a month by representatives of foreign nations, it was submitted informally to a group of Senators, who were asked to meet with Mr. Morgenthau in conference. It became perfectly apparent, not only from his explanation to us, but from the press releases which were issued by the Treasury with reference to the program, that the post-war financial situation may be one of utter chaos. In that situation, in the absence of an international monetary stabilization program, the reciprocal trade agreements program of the United States could in fact spell disaster for our people. No special argument from the Senator from Connecticut is needed in support of that statement. We need only recount some of the developments over the past several years in our own country, and the definite objectives of those in the executive branch at the present moment.

I hold in my hand a copy of the remarks of the Attorney General delivered on the 25th of April 1942, in Washington. I wish to read what he said to the group to whom he delivered those remarks:

You have complete control over production. Obviously you can't suddenly release that control over production simply because tomorrow morning peace is here. You have complete control over the processes of distribution. That can't be thrown over when peace comes. The gap would be too great. You have the problem of the exchange of raw materials. You have the economic problems of the tendency toward inflation on the one side, coming from the fact that most of the goods that people want in times of peace no longer exist, so that the tremendous desire to make and acquire those goods will tend toward an inflationary direction; and on the other hand you have the seeds of deflation coming from the fact that suddenly you are going to retool your plants and throw men out of employment because they can't be used, for a while at least, in production.

To what extent have we used international corporations? We have used domestic Government corporations tentatively, but still with a great deal of skill, and there is enough already in our experience with such organizations as, let's say, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiaries or the Tennessee Valley Authority, to see to what extent flexible and effective and prompt use can be exercised by the Government, through the corporation, and to what extent some control is needed over them.

In the same way I can think of the possibility of an international corporation, with its stock owned by various nations, having flexible powers, and built on the experience of the war. After all, that is what we are doing today. We are buying and selling and distributing enormously through these Government corporations all over the world. To what extent can we use that kind of technique in the peace?

Mr. President, through the Export-Import Bank the Congress has already created, until January 2, 1947, a lending authority of more than $700,000,000. That fund, or $500,000,000 of it, comprises a revolving fund from which exports from the United States have been financed through the Export-Import Bank.

Moreover, every import for many months has been received under directives through the R. F. C., the B. E. W., the Commodity Credit Corporation, and other governmental agencies, exactly in line with what the Attorney General told the group to which I have referred.

More than 66 percent of all the goods which have been imported are duty-free anyway, such as rubber, tin, and other items not indigenous to our productivity, and yet, Mr. President, it is said that the reciprocal trade-agreements program has stimulated all this trade.

I have here in my hand the figures on the imports of gold into this country during the past 8 years, which time coincides roughly with the period for which the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been on the books. The aggregate runs into billions of dollars of gold every year. In 1940 it was four billion one hundred and fifteen millions of gold. In 1939 it was three billion four hundred and seventy-six millions of gold. In 1938 one billion eight hundred and eighty-six millions of gold was brought into this country, and at $35 an ounce, of course, there were credited balances in favor of countries which took our exports. But it is said that the reciprocal trade-agreements program was producing that situation. Yet other claims have been advanced for the reciprocal trade program.

We have been told in the report which the Senator from Georgia filed in behalf of the committee—and he took the House committee report and attached it to one of his own—that the reciprocal trade-agreements program increased both our imports and exports in 1938 and 1939 as compared with earlier years. But the fact of the matter is that for the 6 years from 1924 to 1929, inclusive, our exports amounted to $28,975,000,000, while during the 6 years from 1934 to 1939, inclusive, the exports were only $16,241,000,000.

Mr. President, if we were to take the period of 1938 and 1939 and compare it with 1936 and 1937, we would discover that the average rate of increase in exports of the United States was precisely the same before the trade-agreements program became effective as it was afterward. The trade-agreements program did not increase the rate of exports of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table which clearly demonstrates the facts, and which was prepared for me last week by the United States Tariff Commission, may be included in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in the discussion of the validity of the trade-agreements program, we have completely overlooked the fact that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, since the war broke out, through October 31, 1942, had financed foreign purchases—all reflected in imports, understand—in the amount of $3,188,591,000. We have no possible comprehension even at this minute of the extent of operations of the Board of Economic Warfare, but I know that during the period from April 13 or 14, 1942, through December 31, 1942, it drew on the R. F. C. for more than a billion dollars. When governmental agencies and operating corporations have handled both the exports and imports of the United States, what sophistry it is to say to us, "Do not protect the people of the United States; do not look forward to a post-war period with its disorganized finances, with international currencies gone awry, with war-torn nations having needs which we cannot possibly predict. You must authorize us in the State Department"—someone back of a desk down there—"to pass upon what our destiny and American rights are to be." Yet, Mr. President, that is what it amounts to.

We have been told, "If you do not give these fellows back of a desk down there complete power, the whole program of collaboration and cooperation of the United States with the entire world is doomed to failure."

I have heard it argued on the floor this morning that if we fail to pass the pending joint resolution without amendment, the Smoot-Hawley tariff will be revived. Mr. President, the Smoot-Hawley tariff is now the law of the United States. It has been the law since 1930. It has not been amended in any particular. No one has even suggested that it be repealed, although this administration has had complete control of the Congress since 1934, and, if you please, during the life of the reciprocal trade agreements program.

Mr. President, there are only 1,180 items affected by the reciprocal trade-agreement program now outstanding. There are thousands not touched at all, and, of course, at this minute they are governed by the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

So, Mr. President, it is like drawing a red herring across the trail to say that the adoption of the committee amendment would mean a return to congressional logrolling and legislative tariff making, and all the other types of utterance with which we have been belabored during the past several days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DANAHER. Did the Chair say my time had "practically" expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has expired, leaving out the word "practically."

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Chair for his courtesy in advising me in the premises, and I now yield the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to make an extended argument on this question, but I should like to invite the attention of the Senate to the real situation that exists with regard to the Trade Agreements Act.

The Trade Agreements Act was passed in 1934. Every objection which was then raised is again being raised to the pending renewal measure, and by the same Senators. There is not a thing new in the argument. Not a thing new has transpired in connection with the Trade Agreements Act.

I have not thought it proper, and none of us who are supporting the pending joint resolution have deemed it proper, to submit arguments with reference to the constitutionality of the act, either upon the proposition that a trade agreement is a treaty and must therefore be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, or upon the ground that the Trade Agreements Act constitutes an unlawful delegation of legislative power. Those points have been discussed in this body time after time.

There is in the RECORD of March 29, 1940, the brief of the Attorney General, Mr. Jackson, at that time. It is a long and exhaustive brief, carefully prepared and carefully thought out holding the Trade Agreements Act to be constitutional upon all points of the attack, as I now recall.

Arguments may be found in the RECORD which have been repeated on the pending renewal joint resolution, and which will be repeated on the two constitutional questions which have been injected into the discussion.

Mr. President, the amendment which is now before the Senate admits on its face that it is wholly unnecessary. It is referred to as the committee amendment, and it was adopted by a majority of the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think, in passing, attention should be called to the fact that while it is referred to as the committee amendment, and while it is technically a committee amendment, it was adopted in the committee by a majority of only one vote.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true, but, on the face of it, Mr. President, the amendment which is now before the Senate admits that the action which the Senate is asked to take is wholly unnecessary. The amendment reads:

Provided, That every foreign-trade agreement concluded in accordance with the provisions of said act, as amended, shall be subject to termination 6 months after the cessation of hostilities in the present war as fixed by proclamation of the President, pursuant to joint resolution of the Congress or by the President.

It will be noted that the amendment proposes to declare all trade agreements terminable and, therefore, they are all terminable, and that is written in the very language of the amendment itself. It is not confined to trade agreements hereafter made; it is as applicable to all trade agreements made in the past as those made in the future. The very amendment itself carries on its face the positive, the straight declaration that it is a wholly unnecessary legislative pronouncement. Every Senator who has spoken on this floor has said that, of course, the Congress had the right to abrogate the Trade Agreements Act if it wished to do so and, by a separate act, to abrogate any specific agreement which is outstanding, if it wished to do so; and it would not have to do more than pass an act which changed the rates of the tariff that covered any particular agreement. But the amendment itself, in its own teeth, says that this action is unnecessary, and, therefore, the question arises why is it pressed with so much vigor?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I have only a few moments, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. TAFT. I do not understand the Senator's argument at all. Why is it not necessary, when, if it is not adopted, we authorize a tying up for 3 years?

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to make it plain that the amendment itself says with reference to every single trade agreement heretofore made or hereafter made, whether it has run 6 months or 1 year, that it shall be terminable within 6 months after the termination of hostilities.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield a moment, it is because there are only five trade treaties which have not run for 3 years and they will all expire, in all probability, before the end of the war.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly; I know that; but on the very face of the text is the flat declaration that notice is being served that every one of them can be terminated. I ask the reason why? Why is it desired to put that kind of an amendment in the act?

It is true that of the existing treaties all but five of them have already run for 3 years, and they can be terminated by the President himself or by the Congress as matters now stand. The five remaining can be terminated probably within less time than 6 months after the conclusion of the war, even if initially they run the period fixed in the Trade Agreements Act. But, Mr. President, the point I am making is that the very amendment is a flat admission that it is proposed to do an unnecessary thing. What is the reason for proposing to do it?

Mr. President, in the Finance Committee it was vigorously insisted that, although trade agreements were concluded for a fixed period of not exceeding 3 years—some of them had been negotiated for 2 years—nevertheless, the President was the only organ of the Government which could terminate the agreements even after 3 years or could give notice to terminate them. I wish to read a brief excerpt from a comparatively recent Supreme Court decision, reported in Two Hundred and Ninety-seven United States Reports, at page 114, the opinion being rendered by Mr. Justice Hughes:

As to the third point, we think that the question as to the authority of the Executive in the absence of congressional action, or of action by the treaty-making power, to denounce a treaty of the United States is not here involved. In this instance, the Congress requested and directed the President to give notice of the termination of the treaty provisions in conflict with the act. From every point of view, it was incumbent upon the President, charged with the conduct of negotiations with foreign governments and also with the duty to take care that the laws of the United States are faithfully executed, to reach a conclusion as to the inconsistency between the provisions of the treaty and the provisions of the new law. It is not possible to say that his conclusion as to articles 13 and 14 was arbitrary or inadmissible. Having determined that their termination was necessary, the President, through the Secretary of State, took appropriate steps to effect it—

As directed and required by the Congress.

Here we have the Trade Agreements Act which authorizes the executive branch of the Government to make trade agreements with foreign countries respecting trade, respecting impediments to trade, and restrictions on trade. The Congress may abrogate that act whenever it pleases. Congress may by a direct act change every single duty that is fixed in a trade agreement whenever it pleases to do so. I do not assume that Congress would please to do so. Here is the express declaration of our own Supreme Court that when the authority is given to the President to terminate a trade agreement such authority is also the authority of the Congress because the Congress may direct him and require him to give notice of termination, and he is bound to comply with the law of the land. Indeed, the resolution of Congress itself is, to all intents and purposes, a termination of any particular trade agreement.

Mr. President, I should like to ask Senators to consider the provisions which have been incorporated in the later trade agreements and to see if there is any need to have our hands untied in the post-war period. I should like to quote article 11 of the agreement with Mexico which is one of the recent trade agreements.

1. If, as a result of unforeseen developments and of the concession granted on any article enumerated and described in the schedules annexed to this agreement, such article is being imported in such increased quantities and under such conditions as to cause or threaten serious injury to domestic producers of like or similar articles, the Government—the Government of either country shall be free to withdraw the concession, in whole or in part, or to modify it to the extent and for such time as may be necessary to prevent such injury.

Note the language:

If, as the result of unforeseen developments and of the concession granted on any article enumerated and described * * *.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Is the flexibility which the Senator enunciates a feature of most of the trade agreements, according to his understanding?

Mr. GEORGE. It is a feature of all the trade agreements. I had not read the entire provision of the Mexican agreement, and I should like to read a little more of it:

Accordingly, if the President of the United States of America finds as a fact that imports of any article enumerated and described in schedule II or schedule III are entering the United States of America under the circumstances specified in the preceding sentence, he shall determine whether the withdrawal, in whole or in part, of the concession with regard to the article, or any modification of the concession, by the imposition of quantitative regulations or otherwise, is necessary to prevent such injury.

And so forth. The second provision in that particular section gives to the opposite government identically the same right and the same power. It is as follows:

Before the government of either country shall withdraw or modify a concession pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, it shall give notice in writing to the government of the other country as far in advance as may be practicable and shall afford such other government an opportunity to consult with it in respect of the proposed action; and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached the Government which proposes to take such action shall, nevertheless, be free to do so and the other Government shall be free within thirty days after such action is taken to terminate this agreement in whole or in part on 30 days' written notice.

The general escape clause is also in each agreement we have made, and in the very latest agreement, that with Iran, which, by the way, deals with only a few enumerated articles, there is substantially the same broad clause corresponding to the clause in the Mexican treaty which I have read. But I should like to read that clause, because it happens to be in the latest agreement:

1. If the government of either country should consider that any circumstance, or any measure adopted by the other Government, even though it does not conflict with the terms of this agreement, has the effect of nullifying or impairing any object of the agreement or of prejudicing an industry or the commerce of that country, such other government shall give sympathetic consideration to such written representations or proposals as may be made with a view to effecting a mutually satisfactory adjustment of the matter. If agreement is not reached with respect to the matter within 30 days after such representations or proposals are received, the government which made them shall be free, within 15 days after the expiration of the aforesaid period of 30 days, to terminate this agreement in whole or in part on 30 days' written notice.

2. The governments of the two countries agree to consult together to the fullest possible extent in regard to all matters affecting the operation of the present agreement.

Could anything be broader than that? "If the Government"—of the United States—"should consider that any circumstance has the effect of prejudicing an industry or the commerce of that country," and if the situation is not cured, we can cancel the agreement on short notice. If what we are talking about is practical protection against unforeseen events, it is already provided as fully as it could be, and it is provided in a form which was agreed to and which works both ways, and which, therefore, neither gives offense nor prevents friendly negotiation to work out particular adjustments without wrecking entire agreements. If what we want is practical protection, we would be wise to take it in that form. The amendment is not practical protection; it is notice to the world that we propose to abandon the whole policy 6 months after the war.

The supporters of the amendment insist that they are talking about something which may happen in the future, but has not happened in the past, and they ask, "How do we know that those who are charged with the administration of the act will put this clause in each and every trade agreement made?"

Mr. President, that attitude is on all fours, it seems to me, with the statements of most of the witnesses who have testified on the Trade Agreements Act from the beginning down to this time, and who always admitted that their interests had been very well safeguarded in the past, but that they were worried about what might happen in the future. After 9 years of experience, it is time for us to realize that this program is carefully conducted. There is adequate protection against contingencies in every one of the agreements now existing. The responsible negotiators know as well as we do that the future is uncertain. They have proved that they know how to write adequate protective clauses, and to get them in agreements. I for one am fully confident that they will not forget their wits tomorrow, or next year, or the year after that. The point is that they can provide protection by negotiation and agreement, in a clause which works both ways, and which, therefore, does not drive away the customers or unnecessarily jeopardize the bulk of the provisions in the agreements about which no one has ever complained, either before or after the agreements have entered into force. This is a commercial program, and we should all remember that every bargain has two sides.

The supporters of the amendment are correct as to one point: The period just after the war ends is certain to be, for everyone engaged in foreign trade, the most confused and difficult time they have ever known. Old trade connections everywhere are broken, old lines cut asunder. It is not possible to fight a total war, on every ocean in the world, and start off the next day with trade as usual.

In such a time as that what does private enterprise require in the way of governmental policy and action? I think that what it chiefly needs is continuity—some reasonable prospect that the policy which Government pursues will not be changed too often or too fast. Private enterprise has shown a hundred times that it can operate under very adverse circumstances if the circumstances are stable enough so that they can be provided for. But it cannot deal with constant changes in the main outline and direction of the laws to which it must conform. If we want private foreign trade to revive after the war, and to be prosperous and grow, we must endeavor, so far as in our power lies, to attain stability in the main outline and direction of the regulations we impose on foreign commerce. We shall need flexibility in detail, to deal with unforseen contingencies, but we must do our best to achieve stability in principle and general direction. Certainly we must not formally announce that we intend or contemplate an abrupt and fundamental change, unless we really mean it.

The continuation of the trade-agreements program, and of the agreements negotiated under it, and confidence that they will in general remain in force according to their terms, will provide the necessary element of continuity, and the continuing power to negotiate new individual agreements, and to change old agreements in detail by renewed negotiation, plus the various escape clauses, plus the ultimate power to terminate any particular agreement entirely pursuant to its terms, if the interests of the United States so require—these elements make the program flexible in detail. On that basis, firmly held to through the years, private enterprise can plan and act, and the thriving commerce which we all desire can be developed. But if we say, as the pending amendment proposes, that we are seriously thinking of scrapping, 6 months after the war, everything that has been done since 1934, how can any trader, any export farmer, any export manufacturer, plan, or act, or know what to expect?

If the Senate wants to scrap the program, and the hope for fruitful private foreign trade after the war, then let it vote for this amendment.

I wish to add one further thought and I am done.

What the United States needs most in its foreign policy in general and its international commercial policy in particular is a consistent appreciation of its own real national interest and the continued will to act upon it. It is time that we forgot the local rivalries and fears and prejudices which forever hamstring us when we attempt to state and follow a single foreign policy. The United States is a great and powerful country, and it has many good and powerful friends throughout the world. If we can demonstrate our resolution to work in real collaboration with those friends, not only today in war, but afterward in peace, in the practical affairs which affect our national security and prosperity and theirs, then there is real ground to hope that we may have a peaceful world when this war is over, and great prosperity at home. But if the Senate says—and it will say it if it adopts the pending amendment—that we are getting ready now to cancel all our trade arrangements with them, and theirs with us, 6 months after the war is over, and are getting ready to retire into our economic shell from that time on, then collaboration is impossible, and we are headed straight for economic confusion and chaos.

Mr. President, what is proposed to be done by the amendment would create a situation much like that faced by a man who rents a house, the lease for which contains a stipulation that it may be terminated or canceled on 30 days' notice. The tenant goes into the house and there on the wall of the house he sees the motto, God Bless Our Home, and right under that motto finds the reminding note of his landlord:

DEAR TENANT: Take notice that I have the right on 30 days' notice to terminate your lease.

Affectionately yours,
YOUR CONSIDERATE LANDLORD.

Mr. President, how long will a tenant remain in a house under such circumstances? How long can he remain in it? If the Senate acts as it is now proposed it shall act, how long will it be before all our trade arrangements with other countries will be broken up and disturbed? How long can we continue to do business on such a basis?

Mr. President, I do not speak as a free trader. I wish to make my position clear. I believe in reasonable protection for American industry. I do not believe in monopolistic tariffs, and I am willing to say that whatever administration comes or goes I would rather risk turning such matters over to a body which would apply scientific principles in the writing of a tariff than to go through what I went through in 19 long months in 1929 and 1930 when we produced the Smoot-Hawley tariff measure, an act with which no one was satisfied. Some of the leading Republicans and protectionists on the Senate floor actually voted against it. The only hope of the future for those who want reasonable and fair protection for American industry and the American standard of labor, is to commit our country to some scientific means of tariff formulation and not return to the old and evil practices which brought none of us anything but headaches.

Mr. President, I am quite well aware that much of the real opposition to the Trade Agreements Act arose from a fear that the Congress is parting with too much of its power. The Congress does have the power to regulate foreign trade and commerce, but the Congress is powerless to do it unless it can secure the cooperation of the executive arm of the Government. Congress cannot deal with a foreign country. Congress cannot deal with the commerce which leaves our shores and enters the ports of foreign nations. Congress, the legislative body, can deal with it only if the President, who in external affairs is the only spokesman of the Nation, can be induced to cooperate in our joint effort and our joint enterprise to regulate foreign trade and foreign commerce.

I do not want to do anything now which is equivalent to saying that even at this moment our great Nation is not willing to carry on fair trade negotiations in the narrow field of international commerce. I do not want to see our country take such a position, because of its enormous effect upon everything we shall hereafter do. Senators, we should know that while our country does not propose to commit itself to impossible tasks, and does not propose to go beyond the power which it ought rightfully to exert in the postwar period, nevertheless America today carries the hope of the vast majority of the freemen of all this earth. Why disappoint them by writing into this simple law which has been in effect for 9 years, a notification that we reserve the right when the war is over, to terminate and end all that we have done to promote a helpful and beneficial trade and commercial intercourse between our Nation and the other nations of the world?

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk may read the preamble and resolutions adopted by the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, the largest chamber of commerce organization in the State of Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

At a meeting of the board of directors of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce, St. Louis, Mo., held may 19, 1943, the following resolutions and report submitted by its foreign trade bureau were adopted:

"To the chamber of commerce:

"The foreign trade bureau offers the following preamble and resolution: Our Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act has been tested in peace and in war. It has survived those tests, supported and enlarged our foreign trade, and helped to foster our good neighbor policy. Therefore, we feel that the wrecking of such a comprehensive program at this time should be opposed.

"The renewal of the act is of paramount importance in prosecuting the war, and would likewise serve notice on the world that the United States has a definite foreign trade policy, and that our Nation will help in the construction of a durable peace.

"As early as 1932, the chamber of commerce voiced its approval of liberal trade and urged favorable congressional action until the first act became law, June 12, 1934. In 1937, and again in 1940, we reaffirmed our previously declared principle.

"The foreign trade bureau therefore recommmends to the board of directors of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce again endorses the principle of reciprocal trade agreements and urges the Congress to promptly extend the period for the negotiation and renewal which expires on June 12, 1943; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chamber urges its members who are interested in foreign trade to express their views to their representatives in Washington."

Mr. HAWKES. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement in connection with the joint resolution to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The amendment to this act, which is commonly known as the Trade Agreements Act, and which is just completing its ninth year of existence, has been well explained in the Senate, so I shall not go into details regarding it.

I believe in fair, sound trade agreements between all friendly nations interested in world peace.

Such agreements are most important, and should go to the point where they stimulate us to efficiency in the production of things required by our own people and the people of the world, but never should go to the point where they jeopardize the use of plant capacity in our country, and thus, through causes beyond our control, create substantial unemployment among us.

Emotionalism and sentimentalism should not be the basis for trade agreements. Practical results which satisfy wants, create employment, stimulate competition, and lead to improved production at reduced cost will lead to the cultivation of friendly relationship on a basis of fair mutuality. This should be our aim and hope.

I am in favor of the extension of the act as it is before the Senate, and the cultivation of every sound economic relationship with other responsible nations of the world. I am in favor of the committee amendment, which provides that each agreement made under the amended act shall be subject to termination 6 months after the cessation of hostilities in the present war, as fixed by proclamation of the President pursuant to joint resolution of Congress, or by the President.

I am in favor of the amendment because unknown and uncertain factors will exist after the cessation of hostilities, and at this time no man can foresee them with certainty. This amendment gives only the right to terminate, but does not in itself terminate any agreement. When a majority of the Congress and the Chief Executive agree that such termination should be made, or when two-thirds of the people's representatives in Congress agree that termination and review are necessary in the interest of our people, then I feel we should be in a position to take such action without question.

The amendment is nothing more or less than notice to the world that we wish to review and continue our trade relations on a mutually fair basis. It is doing in international trade relations exactly what we often do in domestic trade contracts.

Even in domestic contracts, where we know considerably more about the existing conditions and situation among ourselves, we use protection clauses, termination options, and review clauses. Why should any ally or foreign nation misconstrue our actions in reserving this right, and interpret it as a decision to cease cooperating when the war is ended? Certainly, no serious-minded ally would place such an interpretation upon this amendment, particularly in view of the contribution being made to the free people of the world by this Nation, without any selfish motives or desires.

Our allies and friends should—and, I believe, will—have respect for us when we provide for review in an unknown situation such as that which will face all peoples and nations when this horrible, devastating war shall have ended.

By extending the act, with the amendment providing for review and termination, if deemed necessary, of all agreements made thereunder 6 months after the end of hostilities, we are placing ourselves and those with whom we deal in a position to proceed in the making of new agreements properly balanced in mutual benefits and obligations, without having any charges of bad faith hurled by one at the other. Such action on our part will simply be a notice to the world that ours is a three-branch system of government, and that the Representatives of the people assembled in Congress are responsible to the people for what happens in their international relationships as well as in their domestic affairs.

The passage of the joint resolution as amended by the committee amendment will mean, to me, that we want to do as much business as possible with other nations. We recognize that the only way to do so is by keeping the agreements fair and properly balanced, after recognizing the conditions of production and the living standards existing in each and every country. In going into the unknown we wish to provide opportunity for a fair and intelligent review, if deemed necessary, at a given time. We want to do so without any danger of being misjudged, misunderstood, or being accused of bad faith. Understanding and the keeping of faith are vital and essential to the continuance of trade relations and to peace itself.

As one of the leaders of the world, we owe a great duty to the world, but likewise we owe a duty to our own people. In properly and fairly serving our own people, and in thus maintaining for mankind the beacon of liberty with the accomplishments and principles of a free people, we shall be serving mankind throughout the world. While attempting to create peace abroad, let us avoid doing the things which will create strife, conflict, and devastation at home. While promoting and developing a strong and sound international viewpoint and relationship, let us not lose our perspective and our loyal cooperation in guarding our home affairs and relations. In guarding them, we shall be preserving the greatest accomplishment of mankind since time immemorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2:30 o'clock has arrived.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 2346) making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

WOMEN'S ARMY AUXILIARY CORPS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 495) to establish a Women's Army Auxiliary Corps for service in the Army of the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in reference to Senate bill 495, a bill to establish a Women's Army Auxiliary Corps, which was passed by the Senate on the 7th of February and considered by the House and passed with amendments on May 27, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. AUSTIN, and Mr. BRIDGES conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the joint resolution, it is proposed to insert the following:

> No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by such section 350, as amended, no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section, and no duties and other import restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any such foreign trade agreement or any such amendatory or supplementary agreement, shall take effect until the Congress by law has specifically approved such agreement and the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, only a profound conviction that the Congress of the United States stands today face to face with the greatest crisis since its establishment moves me to take the time of the Senate this afternoon.

Legislative power has been disappearing all over the world; that is to say, the power of the people to govern themselves through their elected representatives has been written off the statute books of nations occupying one-half of the world. Here in the United States, over a period of from 25 to 50 years, we have been observing legislative power become weaker, and now we see it about to vanish. The right of the people, through their elected representatives, to write the laws by which they shall be governed is dissolving before our very eyes, and we seem not to understand what is being done.

Senators who have been in this Chamber today during the debate will recall that on one or two occasions 15 to 20 minutes were required to summon a quorum of the Senate, because the Members of this body were either in their offices telephoning to executive agencies or were walking into the office of executive leaders with their hats in their hands, asking them to exercise the power which the Constitution gave to the Congress of the United States.

I wish to take advantage of the opportunity when at this moment on the Democratic side there is a large representation of members of the party of Jefferson, to say to them that the principle which I am urging upon them today is the historic principle of the Democratic Party, the party which they represent, the party which sent them here to legislate for their constituents. I am taking advantage of their presence to prove to them that what I say is democratic doctrine; and I am asking the Democratic Members of the Senate to stand by the traditional principles of their party.

During the administration of Woodrow Wilson there was enacted a Democratic tariff bill. It carries the name of one of the great leaders of the Democratic Party, whc honored the House of Representatives when he was a Member there, and honored the Senate when he was a Member here. I refer to Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] while I read from the Underwood Tariff Act a provision which was written into that law by the distinguished Senator from Alabama who was the predecessor of the very able statesman who now occupies the seat of the majority leader.

The Underwood tariff law contained a provision for reciprocal tariff agreements. Some Democratic Members prefer to forget it now. Let me read the provision. It is subsection (a) of section 4:

> That for the purpose of readjusting the present duties on importations into the United States and at the same time to encourage the export trade of this country, the President of the United States is authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

Mr. President, the last time a Democratic Congress wrote a tariff bill, it took the same position as that which I am taking here today, and which I have taken on every occasion when the subject of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was before this body for consideration.

In 1934 I urged that no agreement should become effective until presented to this body. In 1937 I made the same suggestion. In 1940 I offered the same amendment which I am now offering. Again I say to the Senate, do not throw away the right of legislative review, because the surrender of congressional power has gone to such an extent in this great crisis that the Congress may never again be able to recapture it.

Mr. President, the evil of our time is arbitrary central power. We are fighting this war because executive power in other lands has taken away from the legislative representatives of the people the power to pass upon the law, and to say what shall or shall not be the law.

The appalling fact we now face is that this Congress, with an overwhelming majority of Democratic Members, is again being asked to surrender to the Executive the power to perform the responsibility which is ours. We have no means of knowing what exercise will be made of the power which we are asked to give away. We are not permitted to look behind the curtain of Executive power. The work is done in secret, by agents whom we do not know, certainly by agents who were never elected by the people. Is that an exaggerated statement?

Mr. President, I ask Members of the Senate to look at the United States Government Manual, published by the Office of War Information. I ask them to turn to page 158 of that document, and there learn who performs the congressional function with respect to tariff rates, with respect to the regulation of international commerce, and with respect to international agreements. All three of these are parts of the congressional power.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Am I to understand the able Senator to say, or to leave the inference, that these agreements are executed in secret?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They are certainly negotiated in secret, and executed in secret, because no Member of Congress knows what any single item in a reciprocal trade agreement is until it has been promulgated and has become effective so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. Am I in error in surmising that hearings are held, and that notice is given that the Government intends to negotiate with respect to a certain country, and with respect to a certain commodity?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no.

Mr. PEPPER. And that those interested have an opportunity to express their views on the subject before the agreements are executed?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite correct; but I say to the Senator that that is merely a form, meaning nothing.

The Committee for Reciprocity Information which receives the evidence to be presented by interested persons does not execute or negotiate the treaties, and there have been numerous instances of the tentative form of the reciprocal trade agreement having already been drafted before the hearings of the Committee for Reciprocity Information had been concluded.

Mr. President, as I have had occasion heretofore to say, I shall never forget the humiliation which I felt when, several years ago, I attended a hearing held by the Committee for Reciprocity Information, and there saw a dozen Senators and Members of the House of Representatives standing before the committee meekly arguing on behalf of the produce or manufactures of their respective States, asking this appointive board of the Executive to exercise a power which those gentlemen had seen the Congress of the United States delegate away.

When the Senator from Florida asked me to yield I was asking Members of the Senate to turn to page 158 of the United States Government Manual. There are two pages describing the Committee for Reciprocity Information. Bearing in mind that the theory of the legislative branch of the Government is that the people elect responsible officials who perform their duty and then report to the electorate on what they have done, how do the members of the Committe for Reciprocity Information make response to the people of Florida, the people of Wyoming, the people of Georgia, or the people of Utah, with respect to what they are doing in secret?

I read from page 158 of the Government Manual:

> Committee for Reciprocity Information, Tariff Commission Building, E Street between Seventh and Eighth Streets NW. National 3947.
> Members: Chairman: Oscar B. Ryder (Chairman, United States Tariff Commission).
> Representatives of:
> Department of State.
> Department of the Treasury.
> Department of Agriculture.
> Department of Commerce.
> Special assistant and executive secretary, Edward Yardley.

That is all the information we have with respect to the personnel of this body, which, allegedly, gathers information upon which the action of the Executive is based.

When we, the elected Members of the Senate, when the elected Members of the House of Representatives, charged by the Constitution of the United States with the responsibility of doing the things which the Executive is doing, pick up the Manual we are unable to find who exercises the power which we have delegated away.

Then, Mr. President, turn to page 605 of this Manual, where will be found this very interesting notation:

> Committee for Reciprocity Information. Transferred by Executive Order 8190 of July 5, 1939, to the Department of State, to be administered under direction of the Secretary of State. Executive committee on commercial policy continues to exercise its function of selecting certain members of Committee for Reciprocity Information, effective July 1, 1939.

So it appears that the executive committee on commercial policy exercises the function of making the appointments to the committee which was intended to carry out the provisions of the Reciprocity Trade Agreements Act as enacted in 1934, which reads as follows:

> SEC. 4. Before any foreign trade agreement is concluded with any foreign government or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of this act, reasonable public notice of the intention to negotiate an agreement with such government or instrumentality shall be given in order that any interested person may have an opportunity to present his views to the President, or to such agency as the President may designate, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe.

Shakespeare speaks of keeping the "word of promise to our ear" and breaking "it to our hope."

When Congress drew the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in the first place it undertook to provide a system by which the persons affected could be heard, but, in practice, that system has been washed out. When Dr. Sayre appeared before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives at the present session of Congress and testified with respect to the pending extension joint resolution, when he was asked to give the name of the individuals who exercised the power we are about to vote away, his answer to the committee was that nothing would be gained by giving the names.

Ah, Mr. President, I would not be concerned to take the time of the Senate this afternoon if I did not realize what every other Member of the Senate must realize in his daily experience, that the doctrine of the separation of the powers upon which this Government is founded is being wiped away, sometimes, I think, in apparent ignorance of what is being done on the part of those who do it.

It is said if the Congress of the United States reserves to itself the power of legislative review, a power which is reserved by the governments of 22 of the 26 nations with whom we have made reciprocal trade agreements, that, somehow or other the very foundations of international accord will tremble. How can it be said that the foundations of international relations will be shaken if the Congress of the United States reserves the power that the Parliament of Britain has? How can it be said that if the Congress of the United States reserves, as my amendment would reserve, the power to say "yes" or "no" to an agreement after it has been negotiated, as the Government of Canada does, that Canada will take offense?

How can it be said that Mexico will take offense if we in the Congress place the Congress of the United States on the same level with the legislature of Mexico, for the Mexican Congress reserves this power which I ask the Congress of the United States to reserve. It is a false argument, conjured up by the power-hungry bureaus in order to retain the powers we have given them.

It is said that if Congress retains the power to say "yes" or "no," to approve or reject, we shall go back to the old system of logrolling tariffs. How does that follow? This amendment does not provide that the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives shall write a tariff bill. The amendment offered by the distinguished and able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] does not ask for a resumption of logrolling. Again it is a false argument, intended to cover up the appalling contempt which Congress is building up for itself. I say to the Members of the Senate that, if we do not choose to exercise the power which belongs to us, the time is not far distant when people will say, "Well, stay at home if you are not going to do the work the Constitution says you ought to do." That is the way the legislative power has been frittered away.

Let me say a word to some of my friends from the Southern States. When I stood on this floor during the last session and, though I do not believe in poll taxes, spoke against the attempt to regulate the States by an act of Congress, since the Constitution provides the way it should be done, namely, by amendment, they came to me and expressed gratification for the position I had taken in defense of the right of the States to govern themselves. I say to them now, I am defending a far more sacred right, for I am defending the right of the people of the United States to be represented in Congress by responsible Senators and responsible Members of the House of Representatives, who, if they do wrong, can go home to the electorate and be punished, and who, if they do right, can return to their homes and to their constituents and receive the applause which is their due. But, instead of that, we grant the power away, to have it exercised behind a black curtain, in a manner with which no one is familiar, and then some of us seem to think we are acting in defense of the "four freedoms." How can we defend the "four freedoms," Mr. President, if we destroy the primary freedom of the right of the people to write the laws?

Can it be doubted that the power of Congress is involved here? Reciprocal trade agreements take on certain aspects of international treaties. Even the agreements already made do so. The agreement with Colombia modified a treaty. The agreement with Belgium and Luxemburg modified a treaty. If an Executive agreement is of sufficient dignity to modify a treaty, ratified by two-third of the votes of the Senate, who is there to say it does not take on some aspects of a treaty? Treaties are within the jurisdiction of the United States Senate, but we toss that jurisdiction away. Reciprocal trade agreements involve the levying of tariff duties. The power of taxation is a power which was explicitly granted to the Congress; indeed, it was the traditional point of view of all our people, and of our people's ancestors, that the fundamental safeguard of democracy was the power of the purse.

I remember so well when the distinguished former Senator from Tennessee, the distinguished former Representative from Tennessee, the distinguished former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the Honorable Cordell Hull, now the Secretary of State, speaking upon the floor of the Congress referred with pride to the fact that the taxing power had been taken away from the Executive, denouncing the flexible tariff provisions of the Smoot-Hawley law and the Fordney-McCumber law on the ground that they constituted a surrender of the taxing power. He called it a major surrender of the power of the people.

Secretary Hull was right when he made that charge. I am right when I repeat it. We cannot, under any idea of emergency legislation, surrender, as is proposed in the pending measure, a fundamental duty of ours, and defend our action as in any sense a democratic act.

Let me call to the attention of the Senate the point of view, the curiously distorted point of view, under which the State Department is acting. When Dr. Sayre was before the House Ways and Means Committee defending the proposed extension, he was asked in how many countries it was possible to have reciprocal trade agreements go into effect as they go into effect here—by the unsupervised, unregulated, unreviewed discretion of the Executive. He had to say 4, 4 out of all the 26. That, of course, was an unanswerable argument in support of the position I take.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McFARLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Can the Senator give us any light as to how many foreign countries with which we have made agreements have reciprocal trade agreement acts such as the one on our statute books?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No.

Mr. GEORGE. Is the Senator not talking about the other countries simply entering into agreements, having no previous legislative approval thereof, and then taking them back to their parliaments for action?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I disagree with the Senator. In our case there is not a prior approval, because we do not know what is going to be done.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes, there is. I should not care to argue that with the Senator, but certaintly the law is a prior approval.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is another blank check. That is all it is.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; the Senator is wrong. But that was not the point I desired to bring to his attention. Does the Senator know how many other countries have similar acts of their legislatures which authorize the negotiation of reciprocal trade agreements? If so, then there may be some comparative worth in the argument the Senator is making, that in a great many instances trade agreements have to go back to the legislative branches of the governments.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is my judgment that the Government of the United States is the only one in which the legislative body has made a complete surrender, except in the case of the four Dr. Sayre mentioned.

Mr. GEORGE. I asked the Senator if he was prepared to give us the information. I think it is easily ascertainable. I think he will find that in most instances our Government merely enters into an agreement through the officials of the country who have the authority, without any prior act similar to ours.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I quite agree with the Senator; in other words, what the Senator is saying is precisely what I am saying, namely, that the countries with which we are making trade agreements have not seen fit to do what the legislative body of the United States has done, that is to say, give away their power, except in four instances.

Mr. GEORGE. They may not have seen fit to do so, but I cannot see any force in the argument that other countries take trade agreements, for instance, back to their parliament, unless other countries have failed and neglected to take any preliminary steps such as we have taken. In that event, there would be force in the argument.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I confess I do not follow the argument of the Senator from Georgia. He is merely saying that, unless it can be demonstrably proven that other countries have surrendered legislative power to the Executive, then there is no use in bringing up this question. I say that, regardless of what other countries have or have not done, the Congress of the United States should not continue to surrender its power. Already we have given away too much of its power.

Mr. GEORGE. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator. Is the Senator merely speaking of the question of policy, or is he saying that fundamentally we have no right to put these treaties into effect until they are approved by the Congress? Those are quite different propositions.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is a technical difference which I think means nothing. I take the position, though I do not want to be drawn into a constitutional argument——

Mr. GEORGE. I am not trying to get into a constitutional argument.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I wanted to avoid that.

Mr. GEORGE. If it is a question of policy about which the Senator is talking, I can understand his argument.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, I am talking about policy as well as about the primary responsibility of the Congress of the United States.

Returning to Dr. Sayre's testimony:

The agreements not requiring subsequent foreign legislative action are those made with Belgium and Luxemburg—with Cuba, with Ecuador, and with Peru.

That is one agreement—

Those agreements put into effect provisionally, subject to eventual foreign legislative action, are Argentina, Canada, Czechoslovakia, France, Netherlands, Switzerland, Turkey, United Kingdom, and Venezuela.

Those agreements which did not become effective until after foreign legislative action are Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, El Salvador, Finland, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Sweden, and Uruguay.

Mr. Sayre proceeds:

I would like to add that with respect to many of these, they are agreements with countries under the parliamentary system of government. By that, of course, as you realize—

Here is the teacher talking to the members of the Ways and Means Committee—

By that, of course, as you realize, the executive is in control of legislative action. So long as the executive, the prime minister, remains in power, he can command the action of the legislature.

Mr. President, it needs only to be read to be revealed as a completely perverted interpretation of the manner in which a parliamentary government acts. The prime minister is at all times under the command of the parliament, and the moment he acts in a manner which is not in agreement with the parliament he loses his political head. He does not command the parliament. So long as he has the confidence of the parliament he may lead the parliament. A parliamentary form of government is a form under which the legislative and the executive proceed together. But, Mr. President, we have seen develop forms of government in which the executive has complete control, in which the executive can in fact command, and when the command is uttered, then the members of the legislature say "ja" because they dare not say "nay," whatever their judgment may be.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to an inquiry as to the effect of his proposal?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The effect of the proposal?

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes. May I make the specific inquiry as to the method by which it would be implemented? Is it the thought of the Senator that the various agreements or proclamations shall be treated as treaties?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GILLETTE. Or should they be approved by a simple act of the Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They should be approved by an act passed by the Congress, by a majority vote of both Houses. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] will, I understand, later on offer an amendment, the effect of which will be to regard these agreements as treaties, and therefore require a ratification by two-thirds of the Senate. I have not offered such an amendment, because I have felt that since reciprocal trade agreements deal with tariff rates, with the taxing power which under the Constitution must originate in the House of Representatives, it was more in accord with the actualities to regard the agreements as in fact regulations of commerce, or tariff bills amending existing tariff laws, and therefore subject to approval by a majority vote of both Houses.

Mr. GILLETTE. Will the Senator yield to a further query?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETTE. That being the purpose of the Senator's proposal—and I had reached the conclusion that that was the purpose—then under his proposal, should it be adopted, as a matter of application, not only would it be necessary to refer a reciprocal trade agreement to the Congress, to be approved by the Congress by the passage of a joint resolution, but every change in proclamation, every suspension of a rate, every change of a rate, every elimination of a rate, temporary or permanent, would not take effect until it had been presented to the Congress in a joint resolution, and the measure passed by the Congress?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct. The reason is that under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act the State Department has undertaken to do precisely that thing. Having made an agreement with Cuba, then, there was a supplemental agreement dealing with only one particular commodity, and so forth. My thought is that a reciprocal trade agreement should be presented to the Senate and the House for approval, in the form of a joint resolution, and I venture to say that there would be no more difficulty in securing approval of proper agreements than there was in securing the approval of the lend-lease law.

Mr. President, the Members of the Senate and of the House are not stupid. They are not cheap politicians, as many commentators would like to make the country believe. I have found many men in the House and in the Senate who are quite as honest, quite as able, quite as well educated, and quite as competent to handle the affairs of the Government as the anonymous clerks who in effect write the trade agreements.

I am looking at the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and I cannot help but remember that it was he who 4 or 5 years before the outbreak of the war, long before anyone in the executive arm of the Government had the slightest dream of what was coming, introduced in the Senate a bill to provide for the accumulation of strategic minerals and metals. If the policy which was embodied in the bill introduced by the Senator from Utah, and passed by the Congress, had been carried out by the Executive, we would not during the past year and a half have had the troubles with respect to strategic minerals and metals which we encountered, and we would not have them now. I could cite a dozen instances of Members of the Senate and the House having demonstrated their capacity.

What I complain about, Mr. President, is that under a false argument that this sort of government must be carried on by experts in the bureaus we turn our powers over to them, and then fail to supervise the execution of those powers, and by and by we see them absorbed by the Executive.

That was the point which was brought so clearly to my mind when I read the testimony of Dr. Sayre. Following that which I have just read, in which Dr. Sayre was talking about parliamentary government, he further said:

> That is, in those countries one does not have the distinction, the separation, I mean, between legislative and executive functions.

And so saying that the heart of the American system is the separation of the powers, Dr. Sayre asks us to destroy the separation and to clothe the Executive with the legislative power.

It is to that, Mr. President, that I object; and I say to the Members of the Senate there is a definite and clear purpose to by-pass the Congress. I charge that in the executive branch of this Government there are those who deliberately intend to strip the Congress of the power it has, and ought to exercise; and I say to you, Mr. President, that if the Congress does not exercise its power, the time will come when the people will punish the Congress for not exercising it. Do we not recall the returns of the last election, when Members of the House and Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle were defeated because the people felt they had turned their power over to the bureaus, and in resentment of what the bureaus were doing the people retired the Members of Congress who had given away their power?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. I take it the Senator has in mind that the history of the growth of democratic government is always based on the growth of parliamentary government; it is always backed, is it not, and always grows by the increase of power of the legislative body and of the authority of the legislature over the power of the purse?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly the rule.

Mr. GERRY. That is a matter of history; is it not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There can be no question about it.

Mr. GERRY. In democratic governments the fight has always been to take power from the executive and add to the legislative power, if democracy is to work effectively.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Democracy is measured by the degree in which the elected representatives of the people exercise their power. By the degree in which the elected representatives of the people abdicate their power, arbitrary central government grows.

Mr. President, perhaps I should not be taking the time of Senators who are now present if this were the only example of the evil which I am pointing out. The evil is growing also in the field of appropriations, for we pass appropriation bills conveying to the Executive the power to spend billions of dollars in whatever manner the Executive may please, according to his discretion in the exercise of his power. Mr. President, if that were done by the President of the United States himself, that would be one thing; but the powers which we delegate away, although we delegate them in the name of the President, go to subordinates whom nobody knows—nobody, I say, in the sense of the people of the United States, the electorate.

Dr. Alvin Hansen, one of the advisers of the Federal Reserve Board, and an adviser of the National Resources Planning Board, was quoted on June 27, 1942, almost a year ago, in the Chicago Journal of Commerce, as saying:

> Congress will surrender to the administration the power to tax, keeping to itself the right only to establish broad limits within which the administration may move. Congress will appropriate huge sums of money, and surrender its power of directing when and how the money shall be spent. Other extraordinary powers, such as, for instance, to effect wholesale social reforms, will be delegated to the administration, which will retain most, if not all, of the extraordinary wartime powers.

Dr. Hansen was talking about the reorganization which is to follow the war. The point of view expressed by the experts who now man all the bureaus is not a point of view which has ever been passed upon by the people of the States or of the United States, but is a point of view which is built upon the progressive deterioration of the legislative power. We give up a little, and then a little more, and then a little more; and each surrender is used as a precedent for the next surrender we are asked to make.

Take, for example, the story with respect to this very question. It was in 1890 that the McKinley Act was passed. In that act Congress said to the President, "You may, if you find discrimination practiced by certain countries, reduce the tariff on five commodities to this particular level." Congress named the commodities and named the level. That was attacked in the courts; and the famous case of Field versus Clark was argued in the Supreme Court. In that case the Supreme Court said that was not a delegation of legislative power, because no discretion was delegated. It said that the legislative power is the power to exercise discretion. All that the Congress delegated in that law, the Supreme Court held, was the right to the President to find the fact of discrimination; and, upon the finding of the fact of discrimination, certain specific rates went into effect.

Then, in 1897, the Dingley Act was passed. A similar provision with respect to a few commodities was inserted; but the fact that the Congress of 1897 did not believe that the first action was a delegation of legislative power or senatorial power was demonstrated in the very next section of the act, section 4, because there it was provided that the President could make reciprocity treaties with other countries, but then it was also provided that such treaties would have to be ratified by the Senate of the United States. Yet, in the face of that clear declaration of legislative construction, the act of 1890 is now cited as a precedent for this extraordinary grant of power.

The fact that the Democrats in Congress did not believe that it was a precedent for reciprocal trade agreements was demonstrated by the Underwood Act, of which I have spoken, the act of 1916, because there, when giving the power to make reciprocal trade agreements, Congress provided just as I now ask it to provide, that the agreements should be approved by the Congress.

In 1934 we enacted the present reciprocal trade agreements law, on the ground that an emergency existed and that it was necessary to build up our trade; but it was limited to 3 years, because at that time it was not thought possible to induce Congress to surrender power for more than 3 years. Now it is argued that this is not a delegation, but that it is based upon the precedent of the McKinley Act. However, a reading of the law makes it clear that the present law conveys away the discretion which belongs to Congress. It has been given to the Executive; and we have destroyed, so far as this law is concerned, the separation of executive and legislative powers, upon which our Government was founded.

I say that there is a deliberate, clear intention to bypass the Congress of the United States and the Senate. I now undertake to demonstrate it. I have before me a very able and well-written book entitled "International Executive Agreements," written by Mr. Wallace McClure, of the Department of State, and published by the Columbia University Press in 1941. This book was printed after the Senate, in 1940, had failed by four votes to adopt the Pittman amendment, which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] will offer to the pending joint resolution, and after the Senate, by 6 votes, had failed to adopt the amendment which I have now again offered.

The date of publication of this book is very significant. I hope that every Member of the Senate who cherishes the belief that the popularly elected Members of this body and the popularly elected Members of the other House will have something to say about the reorganization of the grand, new, free world we are to have after the victory, will read this declaration of policy. Mr. McClure has made it a very simple matter to analyze, because at the end of each part he summarizes his argument.

Let me submit this argument from page 32 of "International Executive Agreements" by Wallace McClure, of the State Department:

The introductory portions of this monograph are believed to show:

(a) That the two-thirds rule governing the Senate's approval of treaties is not only undemocratic but also, because of its capacity to produce stalemate in time of crisis, a peril to the national welfare.

That is the first statement. The purpose of the joint resolution is to show that the constitutional procedure is undemocratic. Instead of changing such procedure in the constitutional manner by a constitutional amendment—and such amendments have been offered—the purpose is to avoid the Constitution by indirection, and to make the Executive agreement take the place of the treaty-making power. If the authors of the Ball-Burton-Hatch-Hill resolution have wondered why their resolution has been so magnificently neglected, they will probably find the answer in Mr. McClure's book.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from New Mexico seems to be the only member of that group present. We will not look for the answer in any book by Mr. McClure. We are perfectly willing to trust the Senate Committtee on Foreign Relations and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So long as the Congress of the United States continues to grant away its constitutional powers, I am afraid the Senator and his associates will be in danger of looking in vain.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HATCH. I think I can say for the four of us that we are not willing to grant away the constitutional power of the Senate or of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I was sure that would be the answer of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. I still say that I will do as I did in 1934, and again in 1937, and 1940. I will vote against the Senator's amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Returning to the argument of Mr. McClure, I had read paragraph (a). I now read paragraph (b):

(b) That, in the light of historical cases in which Executive agreements and treaties have been used interchangeably to accomplish seemingly identical purposes and which involve authoritative interpretation of the Constitution by legislative, executive, and judicial officers sworn to uphold it, there would seem to be no more doubt of the constitutional validity of one method than of the other. Accordingly, since no division or limitation of the subject matter of international acts is laid down, there is, prima facie, no reason to deny the existence of constitutional authorization for the use of executive agreements relating to whatever subjects may be dealt with by the treaty-making power.

Part 1 comprises a detailed factual account. Its purpose is to set forth the increasing utilization of the democratic method, traced through early, middle, and recent periods, and to demonstrate the extent of actual use of Executive agreements by causing to pass in review as many of them as possible within necessary limits of time and space. The procession is impressive in both amount and variety and is believed to argue powerfully in favor of constitutional warrant for even more extensive employment of these instruments. The primary purpose of Part 1, however, is neither to affirm nor to deny the constitutional validity of what has taken place, but to set forth facts and to let these facts speak for themselves.

On page 190, after a discussion of the world today, the author of "International Executive Agreements" describes the purpose of Part 2:

Part 2 has the purpose of pointing out that the Constitution, today, quite aside from formal amendments, has grown into a complex of customs, procedure, and fixed ways of accomplishing the requirements of government which must be regarded as superadded to the stated articles of the great charter framed at Philadelphia. The interacting influence of convenience and compulsion have created a habit of international dealing with both legislative and contractual character through means other than treaties in the sense of article II, section 2 of the Constitution. This habit has become so confirmed that, whether or not it was intended or foreseen by the people of the United States or their public servants when the Constitution was adopted, it has become a constitutional usage—one of many such usages—to all intents and purposes part of the Constitution and the constitutional system of the country.

Thus, Mr. President, the author makes it clear that the continued delegation of legislative power creates the basis for the argument that a usage has grown up whereby the separation of powers has been erased and the Executive takes over those responsibilities which were intended to be exercised by the elected representatives of the people.

On page 252, at the conclusion of the chapter on usage and external relations, I find this language:

It is believed that the President has, and was intended to have, under the Constitution, all the powers and the functions of the head of a fully recognized member of the society of nations—

Among the fully recognized members of the society of nations today, Mr. President, are the totalitarian powers, in which executive and legislative powers have been combined.

I continue reading:

That he has, accordingly, the authority to enter into any manner of international act, on any subject, that is entered into by other states of the world; and that, while this power must be exercised without violation of the Constitution and in accommodation with other possibly conflicting powers granted by the Constitution, notably, the powers of the legislature, an Executive agreement not in contravention of the Constitution and not in conflict with any act of Congress (best shown by positive congressional confirmation, either before or after signature) is binding on all the executive and all the law-enforcing agencies of the Government and is the equivalent of law.

The Constitution of the United States says that the Constitution itself and the laws enacted thereunder, as well as treaties made under the authority of the United States, are the supreme law of the land. We are now told that Executive agreements likewise can become the supreme law of the land, though Congress has not participated in writing them.

I shall now read from page 363 of the book entitled "International Executive Agreements," from which I have been reading, a statement which is one of the most revealing of all.

The President can do by Executive agreement anything that he can do by treaty, provided that Congress by law cooperates. And there is a very wide field of action in which the cooperation of Congress is not necessary; indeed, where Congress possesses no constitutional authority to dissent.

These two sentences—

Says Mr. McClure—

offer the nutshell statement of the theme and thesis of this book and what is believed to be the result of a correct presentation of law and fact. It is true that, in strict logic, a case can be made for the President's constitutional authority to enter into and enforce any bona fide international agreement that is not in conflict with the Constitution, regardless of congressional approval or at least if Congress does not by law dissent.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BONE. Is it the view of the able Senator from Wyoming that Congress would lack the power to void one of these agreements if it so desired?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I say that if the Congress wanted to void a treaty it would have to pass a joint resolution which would then have to receive the approval of the President. If it did not receive such approval it would have to be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BONE. That is correct; it takes a two-thirds vote.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Whereas the subjects with which we are dealing are within the initial jurisdiction of Congress, and if we now say that a reciprocal trade agreement, in order to be effective, must have the approval of the majority of the Congress, then it will not be necessary to pass a joint resolution with respect to this matter over a Presidential veto.

Mr. BONE. The point I seek to make is that the Congress has the power, should enough votes be registered, to void one of these agreements. The exercise of the two-thirds rule would not be unusual. The rule requires a two-thirds vote to ratify treaties.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No, but what I am attempting to point out is that what the Congress can do now by a majority vote, should the pending joint resolution be passed, it can do only by a two-thirds vote if there should be a veto.

Mr. BONE. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator's view. It has always been my view that Congress has the power to void this kind of an arrangement, or even a treaty. If we want to place ourselves in the position of violating an agreement we can do so. Congress has the power to abrogate a treaty if it so desires.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. BONE. There is nothing I know of in the way of a law which Congress cannot get rid of, except overriding the Constitution. That can be done only by amendment, which must be ratified by the States. Congress has the power to upset treaties, and trade agreements are certainly no more sacred than are treaties.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. However, as I have pointed out, in the case of the veto Congress can act only by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. President, I shall not prolong the discussion. Allow me to assert now what I said in the beginning, that I have risen only because of a profound conviction that the Congress of the United States cannot, with safety, surrender its legislative power in this great crisis in international affairs. We are living in one of the greatest of all those transformation periods of civilization. No man living knows what will come out of this war. No man living can predict the course the reorganization will follow. But we do know that the regulation of international trade will have a vital effect upon that course. We know that already by the use of the Executive agreements international commerce is being regulated. We know that commitments have been made under the Lease-Lend Act. If we now grant the authority which we are being asked to grant, before the peace has been won, we must know that the legislative power which we have with respect to the regulation of foreign commerce will be exercised by the Executive. That, Mr. President, would be a surrender of the power of the Congress to which I cannot give my adherence.

I still believe in the fundamental philosophy of Jefferson. I still believe in the fundamental philosophy of Lincoln. I believe in what the Democratic Party has stood for throughout its life. I believe that the sacred foundation stone of free government is a free legislative assembly exercising the legislative power. If ever there was a time when that freedom should not be surrendered, Mr. President, this is the time. Let the Congress preserve at least the right to ratify these agreements.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, does the amendment which the Senator has offered begin with the words "No foreign trade agreements heretofore entered into" and end with the words "restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement"?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes. That is the amendment which is printed in my name, and the only amendment printed in my name.

Mr. President, I have said that in presenting this amendment I am acting in accordance with the traditional policy of the Democratic Party. I have quoted from the Underwood Tariff Act to show that it was the Democratic policy in the administration of Woodrow Wilson. I should like also to quote from a speech by the Honorable Cordell Hull, now Secretary of State, delivered in the House of Representatives in 1929, and from a speech made by the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, one of the great progressives of our time, who also expressed the point of view which I have expressed here today. I ask that these quotations may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the speech of Hon. Cordell Hull, House of Representatives, May 13, 1929 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 71st Cong., 1st sess., vol. 71, pt. 2, p. 1212) commenting on the Hawley-Smoot bill]

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible tariff clause is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of a government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, "This is too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want." * * * "This proposal embraces another revolutionary policy, which is, to abandon the law and the Republican doctrine to the effect that all tariffs should be measured by the difference between production costs here and abroad, by adding a number of alternative so-called methods to ascertain what is termed conditions of competition between this and other countries. It is proposed thus to give the President and his Tariff Commission, which, by the way, is virtually taken away from Congress, authority to use what in practical effect will be any sort of basis on which to fix tariff rates."

* * * * *

That we are unalterably opposed to section 315 of the Tariff Act, the flexible provision, and demand its speedy repeal. That we strongly condemn the proposed course of the Republican Party which contemplates the enlargement and retention of this provision, with such additional authority to the President as would practically vest in him the supreme taxing power of the Nation, contrary to the plainest and most fundamental provisions of the Constitution—a vast and uncontrolled power, larger than had been surrendered by one great coordinate department of Government to another since the British House of Commons wrenched the taxing power from an autocratic King.

QUOTATION OF SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH OF MONTANA ON THE FLOOR OF THE SENATE AUGUST 10, 1922

Whatever doubt may be entertained by anyone concerning the constitutionality of the amendments under consideration, no doubts ought to exist in the mind of anyone, in my judgment, as to their unwisdom. Their stoutest defenders will probably disclaim any attachment whatever to the principle they represent as a feature of a permanent tariff policy; indeed, they hasten to convey the assurance that, were it not for the chaotic business conditions which prevail throughout the world and the instability of foreign exchange, they could not be induced to embrace it or even to tolerate it. Some apology, Mr. President, is certainly in order for such an astounding delegation of the functions of Congress to the Executive, vesting him with an authority no constitutional monarch may exercise, in character quite like that for the assumption of which kings have been brought to the block.

No emergency, however grave, can justify the surrender into the hands of the President of the taxing power entrusted by the people to their representatives in Congress, no matter how profound may be his statesmanship or how exalted may be the character of the man who for a brief period may be elevated to that high office. If this encroachment upon the liberties of the people is either sanctioned or condoned there is no man wise enough nor prescient enough to foresee the ultimate consequences.

It is said that an exigency exists demanding this departure from the settled policy of our Government. Our skies are never wholly clear; emergencies continually confront us, and when they are wanting an ambitious President or an indolent or subservient Congress will have no difficulty whatever in conjuring up such.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I shall take only a brief portion of the Senate's time to discuss the most important phase of the proposal to extend the authority of the Executive to negotiate trade treaties with other nations. We should make it clear—and I think we have made it clear—that whatever action we take on the pending measure in its practical application will not affect the operation of the present treaties nor of those which will be made before the present authority expires, and that will include agreements with almost all the principal nations of the world. They can be honorably terminated under present provisions only by order of the President.

The direct question posed today is not upon the issue of the policy of protection for American markets versus the free-trade policy, adroitly concealed in the Hull trade treaties. I should welcome the opportunity to try that issue before the bar of public opinion. The doctrine of the protection of markets for the products of American labor and American farmers has been the traditional policy of the Republican Party. In the days of the party's infancy Abraham Lincoln, brushing aside all the mists of theory and the confusion of words, expressed the fundamental principle of protection when he said, in substance, "I do not know a great deal about the tariff, but I do know that when you exchange American dollars for foreign-made goods, we have the goods and the other nation has the dollars, but when we exchange American dollars for American-made goods, we have both the dollars and the goods."

This philosophy was tersely and plainly restated the other day by the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] when he said, in substance, "The farmers of my State are not concerned about the fulsome theories of foreign trade, but they do know that when they drive a hundred head of hogs to a market that is glutted by a shipment of hogs from a foreign market they find that the price has been depressed by the surplus of hogs and they feel that they have been sold down the river and no political arguments of theorists or Utopian ideas of idealists are going to alleviate their anger."

During my campaign for the United States Senate I took throughout the State of Indiana exhibits of commodities imported into this country by permission of these trade treaties—commodities which were in direct competition with goods which had been produced in this country.

Into a city where a shoe factory was closed down I took shoes made in Czechoslovakia.

Into a town whose textile mills were closed down I took fabrics made in Japan.

Into cities whose steel hearths were cold I took metal products from Belgium.

In communities whose prosperity depended on the economic level of agriculture I found frying chickens, canned meat, and grain from Argentina, with which country our trade agreements have been most generous, but which has not associated herself in the war effort, nor is she represented in the international food conference now being held at Hot Springs.

In all these communities I found impressive contributions to our huge roll of the unemployed. I found many on W. P. A. who had formerly earned good wages on the farm or in the factories.

I was convinced by the election returns in those communities that the people were opposed to these trade agreements.

Somehow, in every generation we need to re-learn the lesson that the superior standard of living which our American workmen and American farmers enjoy cannot be supported if the essentials of that standard of living have to come in competition with products made by the low-paid labor of other lands. I am sure the American people, from the experience gained in recent years, are eager to pass judgment on that question again.

Neither shall the extent of our willingness to cooperate with other nations in sound post-war collaboration be judged by the question before us. Again I am willing to try that issue before the bar of American public opinion. The American people are sick and tired of the fantastic theories of the New Deal—that we can spend ourselves rich, and that deficit financing is a sure way to universal happiness and prosperity. These policies are advocated because the New Deal never has and does not know how to operate in a period of solvency.

Furthermore, the American people are fed up with the doctrine that we can buy good will by giving away our markets and our resources in the vain hope that we can make everybody happy by sharing everybody's misery.

Of course, every sensible American believes in real reciprocity, and real reciprocity is based upon an understanding that works a profitable advantage to both parties to a transaction. There is no good will gained by surfeiting our markets with importations from other lands of commodities of which we already have a surplus. There is no sound advantage in merely swapping jackknives except, of course, to international bankers who profit in handling the exchange of money and who are the most zealous advocates of these trade agreements.

There is a sound basis for good will between nations in the exchange of the surplus goods we have for surplus goods which other nations have and which we need. There is a sound basis for good will in helping other nations to develop their own resources and to stand upon their own feet. You gain the good will of your distressed fellow man only when you aid him to become self-supporting. You do not gain his good will when you maintain him as an object of patronizing benevolence. World-wide W. P. A. will fail to establish world-wide security, just as our national W. P. A. failed to establish national security, because the process sabotages the ability of the Nation, as it does the ability of the individual, to attain self-sufficiency which is necessary to self pride.

America, of course, will collaborate with other nations in a sound post-war economic pattern. But in order to do that, it is not necessary to accept the present policy of international trade relationships as a sine qua non of world cooperation.

Indeed, no one will now claim in face of the present world upheaval that these trade agreements have prevented war. Nor am I so partisan-minded as to say that they have caused war. At the peace table will be found the keenest minds of the world. Great Britain and Russia, through their leaders, have declared their determination to maintain the interests of their respective nations. We should be equally frank with respect to our own intentions. Our leaders at the peace table must be prepared to meet the skillful and adroit diplomats of other nations. They must be equipped with every reserve force we can give them. How tragic it would be if again at the peace table we should have nothing with which to bargain except a group of glittering ideals because America's rich economic advantages had all been committed through trade agreements, and our representatives found themselves destitute of bargaining power.

But the real issue before the Senate today, and it is a tremendous issue, is whether we shall continue to delegate to the President functions which belong to the Congress. I would be glad also to try this cause before the bar of public opinion. The shrillest note in the rising chorus against the New Deal is that which calls to the Congress to recapture the unnecessary powers granted to the President and to reassume its fundamental responsibility to be the spokesman of the people in establishing the policies which most vitally affect them.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EASTLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator said he would be willing to try the question of reciprocal trade agreements at the bar of public opinion. I understand these agreements were in effect in 1936 and in 1940.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. So far as the Senator's party is concerned, the bar of public opinion is closed on the trade agreements, both as to 1936 and 1940.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. So I think the Senator had a pretty fair trial at the bar of public opinion.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I think the increasing membership of Republicans in the Congress is the answer to that thought.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Reference has been made several times to the bureaus here in Washington being responsible for the defeat of many Democrats in 1942. This may not be worth anything, so far as opinion is concerned, but had the leader of the Senator's party, Mr. Willkie, been elected in 1940—the candidate the Senator supported so nobly—there is no question in my mind that we would have had a World War just the same. Does the Senator agree with me in that?

Mr. WILLIS. I believe Mr. Willkie and Mr. Roosevelt both promised we would be kept out of war, but——

Mr. LUCAS. That is not at all the question I am asking the Senator. If he desires to debate with me the question which he has raised, I am asking whether or not he agrees with me that Japan would have stabbed us in the back some time in 1941 whether Roosevelt had been President or Willkie had been President.

Mr. WILLIS. I agree that is probably true.

Mr. LUCAS. And when Japan stabbed us in the back, that started a world war, and placed the United States in the middle of the conflict. Senators on the other side of the aisle are constantly denouncing the New Deal, they are constantly talking about the bureaucrats in Government. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] in making his trade-agreements speech, mentioned 17 different types of bureaucrats, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BUSHFIELD] also had much to say about so-called, self-styled experts, dreamers, and planners.

I undertake to say you are on the wrong road. The New Deal did not bring your people to power in 1942; the war brought the Republicans to Congress. As a result of the war, there were all these little annoyances, such as rationing of gasoline, fuel oil, sugar, and coffee. A free people were irritated. They were not ready for these necessary acts of partial regimentation. In my opinion, that was what brought the Republicans to Congress, and nothing else, and had Mr. Willkie, the leader of the Senator's party now, although you do not recognize him, been elected President in 1940, the Democrats would have had a landslide in 1942, because war would have occurred just the same. Thank God for the good of the United States and the world Roosevelt was elected. I think the Senator will agree with that, too.

Mr. WILLIS. I cannot agree with the philosophy of the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I just asked the Senator whether or not he agreed with me that Roosevelt was the man who should have been elected from the standpoint of the United States and the world, in view of what happened.

Mr. WILLIS. No, I will not agree to that.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator thinks Willkie should have been elected?

Mr WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. I think Mr. Willkie will be glad to hear that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. One of the greatest tragedies that has come to America in my lifetime was when we deserted the principle of two terms only for any President of the United States.

Mr. LUCAS. The people spoke on that in 1940, did they not?

Mr. WILLIS. I believe they did; but they were mistaken.

Mr. LUCAS. The question went before the bar of public opinion, where the Senator is now requesting the American people to decide again with respect to trade agreements. They spoke definitely in 1940, regardless of what the Senator may think.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. I wonder whether the Senator from Illinois believes the people are right only when they decide in his favor. Were they wrong in 1942, when, the Senator said the question was rationing, but everyone else in America knows very well the question was the bureaucrats who were administering the rationing in a way that has never been able to justify itself, not only on this side of the aisle, but on the other side of the aisle, from which we have heard the most vehement criticism.

Mr. LUCAS. That may be correct. It is hardly in point.

Mr. WILLIS. I thank the Senator from Maine. Those were the thoughts which were in my mind.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine can take any view he desires to take with respect to what happened in 1942. I have my opinion, and the Senator has his. I merely spoke with respect to what happened in 1940 before the bar of public opinion. The Senator from Indiana said that was the greatest tragedy that happened; but the people spoke. The people spoke in 1942; that is correct; and to whatever the people say the Senator from Illinois is willing to agree, and the Senator will stand in 1944 with what the majority agrees to, as will the Senator from Maine, and the Senator from Indiana. There is no disagreement on that.

I am talking about what has occurred. I am talking about the third term, talking about taking trade treaties before the bar of public opinion. Those things have been before the bar of public opinion, and the American people have answered twice on the trade treaties. The Republican Party had the opportunity to take that question before the people in 1936 and 1940, and it did so, and notwithstanding that fact, Roosevelt carried Illinois in 1936 and 1940. They had an opportunity to take the third term question to the people in 1940, and they did. I traveled over 13 States, I saw Uncle Sam with his thumb down upon every billboard in every county, with the inscription, "No third term." I do not know how much it cost to place that one poster throughout America. It was an effective one, too, and they did not wait until the last week in the campaign to emphasize the third term. There was not a Republican spokesman in America who was not out on the stump discussing the third term. The people spoke, and they said, "We will have Roosevelt again for a third term." That is how they stood.

I thank the Senator for permitting this interruption, I am very happy to know that the Senator has gone back with Mr. Willkie. That is the finest thing that has happened to Mr. Willkie lately, and I know he will want to know about it. I am told that in Indiana he is not in quite so good favor as he was in 1940, and with the Senator supporting him, I know Indiana will go along all right.

Mr. WILLIS. I have no desire to argue with the Senator from Illinois about the merits of Mr. Willkie, or the voice of the people, but I suggest that he call the roll of Representatives and Senators of 1940 and of 1943, and he will see the answer of the American people at the bar of public opinion.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Commenting on the position of Mr. Willkie in Indiana, about which I have heard something similar to that the Senator has mentioned, I have also heard reports as to whether the Senator from Illinois commanded the same confidence in Illinois that he did 3 or 4 years ago.

Mr. LUCAS. I have heard that about the Senator from Maine, too, and it was not so good. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I should like to proceed with my presentation.

Time and again we hear the charge that Congress has lost face with the people, and why should not that impression be growing in the country if we lend basis to the charge by failure to perform our constitutional duties? Why should not the people look to the Executive to direct all the policies of the country if we fail to do our part? Why should not dictatorial procedures gain favor if Congress supinely abdicates its responsibilities?

I am sure that every Member of the Congress is deeply concerned that such an impression should exist in the country, yet every time an opportunity arises to regain the powers which have been delegated to the Executive, some group will clamor that this is not the time and that the specific issue then being discussed is not the one on which we should begin this reform. We have too long delayed in responding to the demand of a citizenry grown impatient with the failure of Congress to function. If repeatedly we neglect to lay hold on the opportunity to recover our powers, is it not to be expected that there will be an increasing lack of confidence in the Congress? Does not our delay create a threat against the very form of our government?

Mr. President, the people of America today stand in grave danger of losing their constitutionally granted rights that the provisions of no treaty negotiated on their behalf shall be effective until approved by two-thirds of their voting representatives in the United States Senate.

Just as the people were rudely awakened from their naive thought that the congressional prerogative for declaring war would always be a deliberative safeguard rather than a mere post facto formality, so much the people now take care lest the same Executive habit of keeping the conduct of foreign relations exclusively in its own hands leave the people with even less to say about the peace than they had to say about the war.

There exists today two distinct and practical threats to our constitutionally defined procedure for making international commitments.

First. The Congress might, by resolution, enact an expression of sentiment which might be seized upon by the Executive as constituting advance advice and consent to whatever international commitment he might choose to make; or Second. The Executive, by so-called Executive agreement, might make an international commitment without the consent of the Senate, which, while being in reality a treaty, could be interpreted as being an Executive agreement merely by virtue of the fact that it had not been submitted to the Senate for two-thirds concurrence.

Congress on the one hand, acting by resolution and without participation of the President, annexed Texas in 1845; annexed Hawaii; ended war with the Central Powers on July 2, 1921; and made the United States party to the International Labor Convention on July 19, 1934.

The President, on the other hand, acting by so-called Executive agreement, and without participation of the Congress, concluded a treaty with Great Britain in 1817 limiting naval forces on the Great Lakes, which agreement was not submitted to the Senate until a year later.

Notes on the open door in China were handled exclusively by the Executive, without congressional participation, in 1889 and 1890. The immigration agreement with Japan in 1907; the grant of special Japanese rights in China in 1917; the armistice of November 11, 1918; and in the same category the so-called trade agreements embodying Secretary Hull's philosophy of world trade—all were in fact treaties, but were not submitted to the Senate for its concurrence merely because the Executive, for convenience' sake, chose to call them agreements.

In 1907 President Theodore Roosevelt made an agreement with bankrupt Santo Domingo whereby the United States controlled that country's customhouses to prevent similar action on the part of European creditors.

President Roosevelt wrote in his autobiography:

I put the agreement into effect and I continued its execution for 2 years before the Senate acted. * * * But it is far preferable that there should be action by Congress—so that we might be proceeding under a treaty which was the law of the land and not merely by a directive of the Chief Executive which would lapse when the particular Executive left office.

He added—

Nevertheless, even when the Senate refused to ratify it finally, Roosevelt kept it in effect.

Considering it—

He wrote—

as a simple (Executive) agreement which would be converted into a treaty whenever the Senate acted.

Parenthetically, I would state that there is not even a legal precedent for Theodore Roosevelt's belief that an Executive agreement loses its effect upon the passing of a specific Chief Executive from the scene.

Executive agreements formerly concerned themselves merely with postal, copyright, and trade-mark conventions, claims, and real reciprocity agreements to implement an established congressional policy. Real reciprocity agreements, of course, were in the same class with trade-marks and copyrights, in that they were only a matter of common sense and convenience. The trade agreements which we are considering today cannot rightfully fall into that class because they are controversial questions of fundamental foreign policy.

This view was upheld in the Supreme Court decision in the case of Field against Clark, which ruled that "Executive agreements" were necessary and proper agreements, but only to carry out the already-expressed will of the Congress.

The decision in the case of Field against Clark would be an excellent precedent for citation by those who, today, wish to preserve the spirit and intent of the Constitution in matters of international commitments, were it not for the more recent decision, during the New Deal administration, wherein the Supreme Court, in the case of United States against Belmont, decided on May 3, 1937, that the President is—in the words of the decision—"the sole organ" of international relations for the United States; and that the "Executive agreement" is just as much "the supreme law of the land" as a treaty is declared to be in article 6, clause 2, of the Constitution.

In fact, the United States against Belmont decision went so far as to reverse a lower court decision which had protected the integrity of a law and policy of one of our 48 States. This decision ruled, in effect, that an "international Executive agreement" made by the President without congressional participation or Senatorial concurrence is the "supreme law of the land" even to the extent of over-ruling any laws or policies of a State if inconsistent with the "Executive agreement."

In the case of the Executive agreement made with Santo Domingo by President Theodore Roosevelt, in which instance he chose to keep it in effect even after the Senate had refused to concur, Edwin S. Corwin, distinguished authority on constitutional law, says:

The only substantial difference between the President's agreement and the treaty which superseded it is to be found in the mere fact that the latter was ratified by the Senate.

Many legal scholars, of course, are of the opinion that an Executive agreement should be made to become a treaty by concurrence in it by two-thirds of the Senators present, if it is not to have the effect of a domestic law. That is the opinion of thousands of persons jealous of their rights and of their very form of government. It is no doubt the implied will of the Constitution. Certainly it is the spirit of the Constitution.

But, as Corwin points out, it is for the most part "a problem of practical statesmanship rather than of constitutional law."

It is what Woodrow Wilson had in mind when he wrote, in 1908, that—

If the President have character, modesty, devotion, and insight as well as force, he can bring himself and the Senate into a great and efficient body of common counsel.

On many fronts today there are indications of intent to sidestep the spirit of the Constitution, the express right of the people to choose their own representatives empowered with the duty of passing upon international commitments.

Nowhere is there indication of what Woodrow Wilson spoke of as the "character, modesty, devotion, and insight" of responsible officials intent upon consulting the people and making international commitments afterward, but rather are we disturbed by the growing habit of officials to effect commitments by devious means before informing the people.

We can only work and pray to the end that the Executive not choose to substitute personal agreement with other nations for agreement by treaty, subject to approval by the representative agents of the people.

But where foreign commerce is concerned, the authority and duty of the Congress is made clear and inalienable by article I, section 8, of the Constitution. Surely, where our prerogative is clear, we should not give it up. Surely we must respect our oath to preserve and defend our sacred Constitution. Preserving to ourselves the right to pass upon these treaties of foreign commerce may strengthen us in what I hope will be future determination to insist upon the right to approve or disapprove the Executive's terms of peace.

Mr. President, it is late, of course. But surely it is not too late to do away with blind vanity.

It is vain of any administration to think it can make agreements with all the world without the approval of its own people.

It is still more vain to think that any temporary administration of the Government of this Nation, by agreements either illegitimate or legitimate, can enforce its will not only upon its own people but upon all the peoples of the earth.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might be able to reach a vote this afternoon on the pending amendment. Let me ask whether the Senator from Connecticut wishes to discuss it?

Mr. DANAHER. I wish to proceed for approximately 2 minutes.

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield to the Senator to get a vote; but I wish to discuss the matter for about 5 minutes.

Mr. DANAHER. I wish to discuss the amendment for about 2 minutes, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, interestingly enough, earlier in the afternoon, shortly after the Senator from Georgia took the floor, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] addressed the Senate as follows:

I think, in passing, attention should be called to the fact that while it is referred to as the committee amendment, and while it is technically a committee amendment, it was adopted in the committee by a majority of only one vote.

The Senator from Georgia replied:

That is true, but, on the face of it—

And then he went on to discuss other phases of the subject, as they addressed themselves to him.

The point I wish to emphasize is that, while the Senator from Missouri apparently would seem to disparage the status of the amendment by describing it in the language he used, the fact of the matter is that indeed it was a committee amendment. There was nothing "technically," if I may use the word used by the Senator from Missouri, to be ascribed to its status at all. It had the majority vote of the committee itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of the total committee.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; of the total committee, as the Senator from Michigan reminds me.

Mr. President, furthermore, I was prompted by the remark of the Senator from Missouri to consider the personnel, the 10 committee members, who had constituted the minority when the vote was taken in the Finance Committee. Of course, there was the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who is chairman of the committee; and, in addition, there were the Senator fron Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs; the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who is the majority leader of the Senate; the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who is chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals; the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], who is chairman of the Committee on Rules; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], who is chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], who not only is chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, but, I think it might quite pointedly be observed, is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee; the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], who is chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. President, that was the lineup of committee chairmen, the organized—consistently, thoroughly, completely organized—majority membership in that committee, voting as I have indicated. There may or may not be the slightest connection between the fact that the vote in the committee was 11 to 10, and that the vote on the floor was 51 to 33, adverse to the committee amendment, and the fact that the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Jones, sat right here on the floor of the Senate during the course of the debate this very day, and that he interviewed Senators in the lobby, right behind the rostrum now ococupied by the distinguished Senator from Delaware. There may be no connection whatever between all those events; but I have at hand the results of the findings of Dr. Alvin Hansen, who is economic adviser to the Federal Reserve Board, who points out that in the postwar period, at the very minimum, 15,000,000 persons now employed will be unemployed. He estimates that a figure approximating 18,000,000 might, indeed, be a proper estimate; but, to be conservative, he takes the figure 15,000,000.

Mr. President, when we in this country surround our laboring people with unemployment compensation protections, social security benefits, the benefits of organization under the so-called Wagner Act, and all the other advantages which have come with legislation, and which I most assuredly support, I can say that the post-war world, with millions of persons unemployed, will find our people in competition with the citizens of other countries who have no such protections, countries where exploitation of the laboring man will be enforced, where there will be thrown into competition with the products of our workers the products of foreign countries where the labor costs are one-tenth or one-twelfth of what they are in this country.

Mr. President, as of that date, when I look forward to that period of post-war unemployment, when I realize what it will mean to the economy of the people of the United States, and when I realize the dangers which confront us and the chaos which will ensue, I think perhaps I might like to cast my eye back over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 1, 1943, and I might conceivably like to see a few of the little items to which I have just adverted, which, were they not now to appear in the cold black-and-white of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, might otherwise be lost.

So, Mr. President, perhaps when we total the votes here the score has been made. The consequences lie ahead of us. I can see them, Mr. President; I can realize they are coming. I can assure the Senate that June 1, 1943, will have a relationship, in the events which transpired here today, to the trade-agreements program and the opportunity the Congress might otherwise have had to reappraise the American status in the world economy.

Mr. President, I am glad it was a part of my opportunity here to have supported the committee amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if it is consistent with the full development of this particular subject, I hope we may obtain a vote on it this evening.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming reads as follows:

> No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by such section 350, as amended, no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section, and no duties and other important restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any such foreign trade agreement or any such amendatory or supplementary agreement, shall take effect until the Congress by law has specifically approved such agreement and the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement.

Not only are the department and the President to negotiate trade agreements, but the agreements must be enacted as law before they become effective; and with respect to all agreements which are now outstanding, before any modifications or changes can be made in them, or any amendatory or supplementary agreements can be made effective, the question must be submitted to the Congress and the proposed modifications must be ratified by an act of Congress.

To me it is a very strange amendment, and I am quite sure that it would prove to be harmful in the extreme in its administration. Senators who think that we can bring trade agreements to the floor of the Senate or the floor of the House without opening up the whole tariff act to debate are simply mistaken. Anyone who has gone through any of the tariff debates as a participant and has observed how all of us are importuned to take care of special narrow and local interests, as against the national general welfare, can well understand why we do not want to lose all we have gained and return to the old method of trying to negotiate, or at least to debate, tariff agreements on the floor, when they would necessarily be open to all kinds of amendments, and there would be a general tariff in each one of them before we got through with it.

I am as strongly opposed as is the Senator who has offered the amendment, for whom I have very great respect and love, to the improper delegation of legislative power to the Executive; but I believe that we must take a factual view of the question. How could the Congress make freight rates, for example? How could the Congress regulate passenger fares? Undoubtedly the power is in the Congress. It does not reside anywhere else. How could the Congress ever devise freight and passenger tariffs which would be equitable and fair and in the national interest? It would be impossible. Therefore we have the Interstate Commerce Commission.

How could the Congress regulate many of the things which are now submitted to commissions—The Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Communications Commission, for example? The Communications Commission regulates transmission by radio of messages in the United States, and outside, to the extent that we have treaties which permit such regulation. Those are all Congressional powers, but they must be exercised through some agency if the job is to be done fairly, equitably, and with any degree of efficiency.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator has referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am glad he did so, because in one of his speeches before the Finance Committee the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] referred to the delegation of power to the Interstate Commerce Commission as being the taking-off point in the abrogation by Congress of its functions and duties. We all know that during the time of its existence the Interstate Commerce Commission has made several thousand rates and orders. Does the Senator believe that if Congress, functioning as a congressional body, had undertaken to pass on each of the questions which it delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission for determination and decision, the Congress would have been able to do anything else during that time?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly not; and it could not have done that job very well, because while it is a matter within the jurisdiction and power of the Congress, it is simply not a matter which can be done without careful and systematic study.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the pending amendment were adopted, and each trade agreement with a foreign power were to open up the subject of the tariff, as the Senator has so well explained, to the extent of a general tariff revision—which it might well do under our rules—would Congress be able to do anything else whatever, or be able to do a good job of tariff revision?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly not.

Mr. President, I wish to make one further observation, and then, so far as I am concerned, when the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] shall have finished, I hope we may have a vote.

When I came to the Congress I had very strong notions that the flexible tariff provision of the act of 1922—the Fordney-McCumber Act—was perhaps an unlawful delegation of legislative powers. I was quite honest in that view. I had the same view as to the provisions in the Smoot-Hawley Act. That is to say, I questioned whether or not there was a proper delegation of power. I concede that Congress may not delegate legislative power. I have never asserted that it could; but Congress can lay down an intelligible principle and delegate the authority to act through the application of that principle to the finding of basic facts.

When I read the cases on this question very carefully, and particularly when I read the opinion of Chief Justice Taft in the celebrated case in which he sustained the validity and constitutionality of the flexible provisions of the tariff act, I was convinced that the delegation of power in both the tariff acts referred to, and again in the trade agreements act, was entirely constitutional and valid.

That is particularly true with respect to the Trade Agreements Act, because while the power to control and regulate interstate and foreign commerce is definitely in the Congress, and is a congressional function, as I stated a while ago in my brief remarks, the Congress cannot exercise the power to regulate foreign commerce without the assistance of the Chief Executive. There must be cooperation and collaboration if there is to be regulation of interstate and foreign commerce. Congress, of course, has the power to do it. Congress may fix tariff rates. Congress may prevent imports from coming in; but if Congress is looking into the larger field with a view of eliminating unnecessary trade restrictions and hindrances, whether in the form of duty or not, if Congress is looking to the broader aspect of the question of regulating interstate and foreign commerce, then Congress must necessarily call upon the President.

The flexible tariff is not a Democratic doctrine. It is a Republican doctrine. Reciprocal trade agreements in their essence are Republican doctrine. The distinguished father of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], when he was President of the United States, was himself an advocate of reciprocity in trade. So was McKinley. So were many leading outstanding Republican leaders of former days. The reciprocal approach to tariff making, if one is to trace its origin and accredit it to either party, is largely the doctrine of our Republican friends. In my judgment the flexible tariff is definitely a Republican doctrine.

There has been a gradual evolution. Of course, the McKinley tariff law was not like the present trade agreements act. The Dingley tariff was different. There has been a gradual evolution.

However, step by step, an effort has been made to find some way of dealing with the complicated and intricate problem of the tariff; and anyone who has lived through it, anyone who went through the experience of framing the Smoot-Hawley Act, must be conscious of the fact that when it is finished it is almost impossible for any man to say that it deserves his support, because it is made up of compromises. It is made up of one compromise after another. I early learned when I entered this body that if I were to get any suitable protection for an industry in my section which I really believed was entitled to some protection, I must go along with someone who wanted protection somewhere else. I early learned that there was not very much to the belief of our farmer friends that they would receive great benefits through the tariff, because by the time they had obtained their duties, through the trades and log-rolling methods to which their representatives had to subject themselves, other industries obtained so much higher duties that all the profits of the farmer were swallowed up, as it were, before he got them.

Irrespective of that and repeating what I said, I think there is a sound basis for protection of American industry and American standards of living, and I am anxious to see that we lose nothing we have gained in our effort to evolve a better method of regulating and fixing our tariffs.

I appreciate that fundamentally the fixing of tariffs comes back to the Congress. I know where the power originates. I know the President has not the power to fix a single tariff rate. He has not the power to fix an embargo. He cannot do it; it is not within his power; but the Congress can delegate to him, as the Chief Executive, the power to negotiate, the power to pare down and to remove unreasonable restrictions if it can be done.

All on earth that is done in the Trade Agreements Act is the acceptance basically of the flexible provisions and principles of both the Fordney-McCumber and the Smoot-Hawley Acts, and saying to the President, "Now, we ask you to negotiate for us, but you must negotiate within the limits of the flexible provisions of those two tariff acts; that is to say, you cannot raise or lower a duty by more than 50 percent. If you can expand our trade and commerce, and relieve it of unnecessary restrictions which hamper and impede commerce, if you can do that, operating up or down within the limits of 50 percent of the basic rates as Congress has fixed those rates, then we empower you to do it."

So, Mr. President, aside from all other considerations, and on the merits, in my opinion, Congress should be willing to continue this power under the Trade Agreements Act for the period of 2 years, the short period to which the House has reduced it. That is aside from the other and more impelling thought at this time, that we certainly ought not to be willing to take any chance on reversing our whole position, thereby disappointing, perhaps even though unjustly, the hopes of so many of the men and women of the world who think we are going at least to undertake to cooperate in the field of commerce and trade, which will be so vital and so necessary for the prosperity of not only our country but of the world after the war ends.

I hope, Mr. President, that we may have a vote.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I wish to make one or two comments on the pending amendment, because I am one of the Senators—I hope there are more—who have changed their policy on the subject of trade agreements hitherto followed.

The State which I represent happens to be in keen competition with Cuba in the production of fresh vegetables. Those who are engaged in that great agricultural industry in my State have been bitterly opposed to trade agreements in the past, due to their belief that under the trade agreements there were certain arrangements made for the importation of fresh vegetables into this country which mitigated against their best interests.

Both my colleague and I in the past have voted, at their instance, and at the instance of the cattle industry and sugar industry, against these trade agreements acts.

However, Mr. President, those votes were cast in peacetime. This is wartime. I know of no way in which we can refrain from placing trust in our own Government to deal fairly with our own citizens. If I am not willing to trust my Government to deal fairly with the people of my State, then I am not a loyal citizen of my country. I am sure that I express the sentiment of every other Senator when I say that I shall always, in every way by which I can do so, try to influence the agencies of the Government executing agreements under such statutory authority as is proposed so as to prevent any action which would mitigate against the substantial and sound interests of my State.

We cannot go back to the old days of isolation or tariff logrolling, yet the Government must have power to try to save from economic chaos the broken world the war will leave us.

Mr. President, it is a good lesson for us to begin to learn that all of us cannot have everything we want and at the same time have the kind of world all of us wish for more than anything else. Every State and every section and every interest, to a degree, is going to have to make some sacrifice if we all are to have the kind of world in which we may prosper, or perhaps survive.

I have thought, therefore, that it might be appropriate to give this word of explanation, because of the changed attitude on the part of my colleague and myself on this subject.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has based the power for the proposed delegation of authority on the flexible tariff provisions of various tariff laws. I wish to point out that those tariff laws prescribe a very definite standard, the standard being the difference between the costs of production in this country and other countries where similar articles are produced. That is a definite standard, a standard which the Tariff Commission could follow. I would approve such a system today. I think that is the kind of system we ought to have today. I think the Tariff Commission itself ought to have authority to make changes in the tariff, or I would even be willing to give them complete authority to write the tariff, referring to the difficulty of Congress writing a tariff.

However, no standard is fixed in this instance. The decision is absolutely in the discretion of the Secretary of State. By reading section 1 of the act it will be seen that it states a great many purposes to be accomplished, but as for prescribing a standard, there is no standard, and that is the difference between the reciprocal trade agreement and the flexible tariff provisions of past acts. After all, it is a distinction as to all delegation of legislative authority.

Of course, we have to delegate much legislative authority, but we prescribe, and should prescribe, a definite standard when we turn over any such authority to administrative boards, and the act prescribes no such standard. It seems to me the flexible tariffs are no precedent whatever for the passage of this kind of measure.

If we were to write in such a provision as one requiring consideration of the cost of production I would vote for the measure immediately, because it seems to me that is what the American people want. However, far from that, this particularly provides that sections 1336 and 1516 shall not apply to the articles covered.

That means that we are delegating to the President of the United States the authority to reduce a tariff to a point at which the foreign cost of production, plus the tariff, is very much less than the American cost of production. That is what it means, without any question, and without any standard except the President's arbitrary discretion. It means that we are delegating to him the power to destroy an American industry if he thinks the industry should be destroyed in the interest of promoting our exports, perhaps, of other products.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Did I correctly understand the Senator to refer to the fact that the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act contains a repealer of section 516 (b) of the act of 1930?

Mr. TAFT. No, the repealer of section 516, as I understand, practically removes any possibility of court appeal.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. TAFT. I referred to the provision of section 1336 of this title, which is the one prescribing the difference in cost of production, which is repealed. So there is no standard in the act. The flexible tariff provision is no authority for the proposed action. As a matter of fact, I would vote for a flexible tariff provision. I think that is the way in which tariffs should be made. I do not think they should be made by such complete, wide-open delegation of authority to the President. It is said he is limited to 50 percent of the Smoot-Hawley tariff rates, but if a tariff be reduced by 50 percent it may be just as destructive of industry as if the tariff were abolished altogether. What is provided is only a limit. It is no standard by which the President can be guided.

Of course, if we refer back to the reciprocity treaties made during the time of McKinley, or to the Canadian reciprocity treaty, we find that those treaties were submitted to the Senate. In the case of the Canadian reciprocity treaty, it was approved by a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate. Certainly no one should object to reciprocity under such circumstances. Those were direct reciprocity treaties. They were direct deals with another nation by which we reduced certain duties in return for reductions on the part of the other nation. There was no application of the most-favored nation clause, and therefore it did not amount to a general reduction of tariff rates such as is provided for in the Trade Agreements Act.

Mr. President, I, too, disapprove of making tariffs by congressional action. I should like to vote for a method of making tariffs which would not be by congressional action, but I cannot see how I can vote for the pending measure, with its complete delegation of arbitrary authority to the President of the United States. While I would not propose the kind of amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, since the leaders in charge of the joint resolution have refused to accept any amendment, have refused to impose any standard, have refused even to impose a limit until 6 months after the war, I have no choice except to vote for the amendment, and against the joint resolution, if the amendment shall not be agreed to. If the amendment shall be agreed to I shall be willing to vote for the joint resolution, although I think it does not provide a scientific method of making tariffs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator from Ohio, in his reference to the remarks of the Senator from Georgia, completely overlooks one fact. In the first place, the Senator from Ohio, in my opinion, is entirely in error as to the question of the delegation of power when he says no standard is set up. Very definite standards are set up in the act. It states the purposes as follows:

> The President, whenever he finds as a fact—

That requires a definite finding of fact—> that any existing duties or other import restrictions of the United States or any foreign country are unduly burdening and restricting the foreign trade of the United States and that the purpose above declared will be promoted by the means hereinafter specified, is authorized from time to time—

To do the things set out thereafter.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio denies the proposition enunciated by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] that the principle of this act is entirely in consonance and in accordance with the principles of the flexible tariff provisions of the various tariff acts we have had. He undertakes to make a distinction because the other acts set up one narrow, definite standard having to do with the cost of production at home and abroad. The Senator from Ohio completely overlooks the fact that any such standard as was set up in the original flexible provisions had already proved itself completely inadequate and inefficient to get out of the tariff situation in which we not only found ourselves, but in which the whole world had been plunged by the prohibitive tariff provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act, the Fordney-McCumber Act, and other Republican tariff acts.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I wish to ask if the Senator can think of any single reduction of more than 50 percent of the rate specified in the Smoot-Hawley Act, which the President would be forbidden to make under the general provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act? In other words, how can there be a standard when there is not a single reduction the President is able to make within the terms of the broad purposes stated in section 1 of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The act set up the authority of the President to adjust these matters between limits, and the limits are set forth in the act. The limits set up in the so-called flexible tariff provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Act and the Fordney-McCumber Act were not applicable, because, through our stupid, short-sighted course, we had forced the other nations of the world, to use a common expression, not only to "see" us but to "raise" us. They had not only adopted prohibitive tariffs, following our bad example, but they had gone on and set up other devices which could not possibly have been reached by the so-called flexible tariff provisions of the tariff acts. They had gone on, from setting up prohibitive tariffs to making discriminatory quotas, which absolutely shut our products, both of the factory and of the field, out of any markets of the world. They had not only done that, they had made arbitrary arrangements as to rates of exchange, which had exactly the same effect on our entrance into other markets as prohibitory tariff acts, and we could not possibly reach them by such strict limitations, such narrow limitations, as were set up in the flexible tariff provisions. So when the present administration came into power, and it was desired really to undertake to cooperate in commercial matters, in international trade, and to undo the bad effects of these prohibitive tariffs, it was decided that it was necessary to give the President authority not only to deal with tariff rates but to undertake to give him authority to remove these discriminations against American trade in the shape of exchange discriminations, quota discriminations, and the like.

I desire to add merely one other thought, to emphasize a point which has been touched on by the Senator from Georgia, because it deals with a matter which has run throughout the debate. For the last 9 years we have heard Senators and Representatives refer to the fact that tariff rates are being changed by action of the officials of the State Department, but of course anyone who will read the act must know that no such statement is true to any degree whatever. Reciprocal trade agreements do not change any tariff rates. The only way tariff rates can be changed is by the President's proclamation, pursuant to a reciprocal trade agreement, and when the President issues his proclamation, he issues it, not in his capacity as Executive, but he issues it as an agent of the Congress, under powers defined and given to him by act of Congress; and that is not such a delegation of authority as the Senators have been discussing to any greater degree than the exercise of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission is a delegation of authority by Congress.

Mr. President, everyone agrees that we should have reciprocity in international trade. The only difference between the kind of reciprocity now sought and the old, bad system of reciprocity in general tariff revision, is that the system under the reciprocal trade agreements contemplates that nations may be able to trade with each other to their mutual advantage, one nation giving up certain things which it can give up without hurting it, in consideration of certain advantages which may help it, and the other countries doing the same thing. That is one kind of reciprocity. The other kind of reciprocity, to which we would return, if the joint resolution were defeated, or crippling amendments to it were adopted, is the old, bad system of reciprocity, "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," when one Senator would say to another, "I am interested in a tariff on coal. I will vote for your tariff on oil if you will vote for my tariff on coal."

Another Senator would say, "I am interested in a tariff on steel. You vote for my tariff on steel and I will vote for your tariff on lumber." That is the sort of reciprocity which brought this country into the depression, from which ever since we have been slowly and toilsomely emerging.

Mr. President, in congressional legislation I will set this sort of reciprocity, a reciprocity of mutual advantage between nations, against the bad, nefarious system of reciprocity of "You scratch my back and I will scratch yours."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. GEORGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I find I can transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], who, if present, would vote as I intend to vote. I am therefore free to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I am not advised how he would vote if present. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROOKS. On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If present, the Senator from Maryland would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on important public business. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] would vote "yea."

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] is paired on this question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN]. If present the Senator from Wyoming would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "nay."

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB] is paired on this question with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. If present, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea" and the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay."

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 50, as follows:

SIMPLIFICATION OF NAVAL ACCOUNTING PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2584) to abolish certain naval trust funds and deposits thereto, and to simplify naval accounting procedure, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. DAVIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

Mr. GEORGE obtained the floor.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Connecticut wish to offer his amendment this afternoon?

Mr. MALONEY. I had intended to ask that it be considered now.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I had in mind submitting a request for a unanimous-consent agreement. However, I yield to the Senator from Connecticut so that he may have his amendment read.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, through the graciousness of the senior Senator from Georgia, I call up the amendment which lies on the desk and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the joint resolution, it is proposed to add the following new section:

SEC. —. Effective on the date of enactment of this act, section 2 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the first section of this act shall take effect until the Senate of the United States shall have advised and consented to its ratification, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to submit a unanimous-consent request that all debate on further amendments to the joint resolution be limited, tomorrow, to let us say, 20 minutes on each amendment, and that no

Senator shall speak more than once on any amendment.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and hoping that I shall not have to object, I am wondering whether it will be possible, under the circumstances, that when the Senate convenes tomorrow I shall have the floor, in view of the fact that my amendment is now pending.

Mr. GEORGE. I intended that that be the case. The reason why I yielded to the Senator, so that he might offer his amendment, was in order that he would have the floor when the Senate convenes tomorrow.

Mr. MALONEY. I thought that was the case. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I shall have no objection to the request.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the unanimous-consent request should carry with it a limitation to 15 minutes debate on the joint resolution. The limitation should apply to the joint resolution as well as to the amendments, in order to hasten the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President, I should have said that.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request, as amended?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I should like to know what the request is?

Mr. GEORGE. I submitted a unanimous-consent request that when the Senate meets tomorrow, each Senator shall be limited to 20 minutes debate on each amendment and on the joint resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not care to object, and I do not care to impede the progress of the measure; but I suggest that there be a limit of 30 minutes on debate on the joint resolution and a limit of 15 minutes on debate on each amendment. I hope the Senator will accept my suggestion, because some of us may want to address the Senate briefly on the pending amendment and on one other amendment which I know will be offered.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad to modify the request as the Senator from Nevada has requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia, as amended?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I assume that the unanimous-consent agreement is that debate shall be limited to 30 minutes on the joint resolution and to 15 minutes on any amendment thereto or motion thereon which may be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request, as amended, submitted by the Senator from Georgia? None is heard, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I should like to give notice also that the conference report on the tax bill, which lies on the desk, will be called up at the earliest possible moment tomorrow, after completion of debate on the pending joint resolution.

Mr. President, I do not think it would require unanimous consent, but I do ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], who has just offered his amendment, be entitled to the floor as soon as the Senate meets tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? None is heard; and it is so ordered.

ASSISTANT CLERK, COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 153, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 153), submitted by Mr. ELLENDER on May 24, 1943, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That, until otherwise provided, the Committee on Claims is authorized to employ an assistant clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $3,600 per annum, and Senate Resolution No. 18, agreed to January 23, 1939, is hereby repealed.

INVESTIGATION RELATING TO FOOD PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 124, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will say to the Senate that this is an additional appropriation to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to carry on certain phases of the investigation which it has been making for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 124) reported by Mr. SMITH from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on April 2, 1943, and, under the rule, referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized (a) to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to any matters relating to the production, transportation, distribution, exportation, utilization, and consumption of food and allied products produced within or imported into the United States and its Territories and possessions, and of all products, commodities, and factors involved therein, including farm prices and shortages of farm labor, machinery, fertilizer, and feed or other commodities necessary to crop and livestock production; and (b) to make inquiries into any policies and practices of the Government which appear to imperil the production and distribution of adequate supplies of food for our armed forces, our civilian population, or our allies. The committee or subcommittee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the result of its investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings; to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Senate in the remainder of the Seventy-eighth Congress; to employ such clerical and other assistants; to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies of the Government; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; and to take such testimony as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

INVESTIGATION OF DISTRIBUTION AND UTILIZATION OF MEDICAL PERSONNEL, FACILITIES, AND RELATED HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably, with an additional amendment, Senate Resolution 74, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may we have the resolution read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 74) heretofore reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments, and from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an additional amendment, as proposed to be amended, was read, as follows:

Whereas the needs of the armed services for medical personnel has brought about acute shortages of doctors, nurses, dentists, and allied personnel in many areas; and

Whereas many centers of war production lack adequate facilities for the maintenance of health; and

Whereas a large number of men have been rejected for military service because of physical or educational deficiencies; and

Whereas the physical and mental fitness of the Nation has a direct bearing upon the efficiency of both the armed forces and civilian efforts in the effective prosecution of the war: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor or a subcommittee thereof to be appointed by the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee be authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation, in cooperation with such public and private agencies and such persons as it might see fit to consult regarding the distribution and utilization of medical personnel, facilities, and related health services: Be it further

Resolved, That the subcommittee be authorized and directed to study and investigate the deficiencies in health and education among persons otherwise fit for service with the armed forces and persons otherwise fit to be employed to the best advantage in agriculture, industry, and other activities so as consistently with the spirit of our institutions, and the national emergency best to promote the war and victory for our cause. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the session, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistance, to require by subpena, or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable.

That the heads of the executive departments and other executive agencies detail and/or engage personnel temporarily to assist the committee upon the request of the chairman. The committee may utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services as it may deem necessary. The committee may utilize the services of facilities of the various departments and agencies of the Government.

The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the subcommittee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the subcommittee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I thought that this proposal involved the subject of manpower. I ask whether it does or not?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], who is the proponent of the resolution.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I think the caption which attracted the Senator's attention had not been properly amended, as the resolution itself had been amended, so as to be limited, not to the general subject of manpower, but to an investigation which comes peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Education and Labor, namely, questions pertaining to education and public health, and the distribution of doctors among the civilian population of the country. The resolution has nothing to do with the general subject of manpower.

Mr. AUSTIN. I accept the statement of the Senator from Florida. Therefore I shall not object. However, I serve notice that I think that jurisdiction of the subject of manpower belongs in the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee is attending to its business in that respect and is holding hearings. It held one today on that subject. The hearings cover the whole field. Not only is it a waste of the energy of committees to refer a similar subject to another committee, but it would not serve the cause of total mobilization.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am in hearty agreement with what the Senator from Vermont says so far as the duplication of authority is concerned in connection with these investigations. Heretofore on the floor of the Senate I have made myself rather clear as to how I feel about such procedure. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that if there is any question in his mind I shall be glad to delay consideration of the resolution until tomorrow, so as to give him an opportunity to examine the resolution and confer with the Senator from Florida, to see if he has any objection to it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I accept the statement of the Senator from Florida without qualification.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask a few questions about this resolution, which I have heard read hastily once. I am not entirely familiar with its provisions. Has the resolution been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. PEPPER. It has.

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, it relates to the question of manpower, and to the question of the health of inductees under selective service. While I am confident that the purpose of the resolution is a worthy one, I wonder if the Senator would mind having the resolution go over for a day, so as to give us an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I shall be glad to have the resolution go over. Let me say to the Senator that it does not relate to anyone who is already in the service. What came to the attention of the Committee on Education and Labor was the fact that at Camp Lee, Va., when 600 white boys were inducted into the service, 193 of them were rejected because they were illiterate. In the country as a whole 2,997,000 men between the ages of 18 and 44 were rejected from selective service because they were either physically, mentally, educationally, or morally deficient. The committee had previously dealt with the subject of the distribution of doctors among the civilian population of the country, and we had rather extended hearings on that subject. It was desired to continue that subject for consideration; but in no sense of the word was there intended to be any encroachment whatever on the military jurisdiction. It was not intended to deal generally with the subject of manpower, but to deal only with questions peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor, including matters of education and public health affecting only the civilian population.

Mr. LODGE. Those are very worthy aims, but I should like to have a day to examine the resolution. I am sure that I approve the aims of the Senator from Florida, but I should like to have a day to examine the resolution. I ask that it go over.

Mr. PEPPER. I shall be glad to have it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

DEPENDENTS OF FRANK EDWARD DACE

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 159, Senate bill 367.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 367) for the relief of dependents of Frank Edward Dace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on the last call of the calendar the bill was objected to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER]. I am advised that he has withdrawn his objection. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 367) for the relief of dependents of Frank Edward Dace was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lynn Jeanett Dace, the sum of $11,800, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for compensation for the death of her husband, Frank Edward Dace, who died as a result of an accident which occurred on February 20, 1942, while he was voluntarily and gratuitously making acceptance flights for the United States Army Air Corps: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

FOOD PRODUCTION AND FOOD PRICES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, a letter addressed by me to Hon. Prentiss M. Brown, Administrator of the Office of Price Administration; three telegrams received by me protesting against the combination "roll-back and subsidy" program to lower food prices, also a radio talk delivered by myself on May 16, 1943, over Broadcasting Station WIBW, dealing with the subject of food production and food prices.

There being no objection, the letter, telegrams, and address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 1, 1943.

Hon. PRENTISS M. BROWN,
Administrator, Office of Price Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I enclose you a telegram I have just received from George W. Catts, executive manager, Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City, Mo., and a telegram from Harlen McLeod, of Gilcrest, Colo., protesting against the proposed roll-back and subsidy for meat effective June 1.

These are typical of numerous similar complaints I have received from others. I am sure there will be a flood of objections from producers, processors, and others interested in the livestock industry in Kansas and other Middle West States.

I also enclose a telegram from the Washington County Cooperative Creamery Co. of Linn, Kans., urging the rescinding of the 10-percent roll-back on butter. I am in hearty sympathy with the appeal made by the butter producers.

I hope you can postpone action on the program mentioned in these telegrams until you have had time to look into the whole matter carefully and thoroughly. I believe thorough study of the situation will convince you the program ought to be abandoned. It will not work. I will appreciate your early consideration of this very important matter.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR CAPPER.

KANSAS CITY, MO., May 31, 1943.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

Proposed plan of the Office of Price Administration roll-back and subsidy for meat effective June 1 will probably lower livestock prices and curtail production. Loss on meat inventories slaughtered prior to June 1 will be reflected in lower prices paid by packers after June 1. Production cannot be maintained in face of questionable feed supply and price uncertainties. Please urge postponement of effective date until all interested groups can be heard and a more equitable and practicable plan developed.

GEORGE W. CATTS,
Executive Manager, Chamber of Commerce.

GILCREST, COLO., May 31, 1943.

Hon. Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.:

You are asking the feeder to produce more pounds of meat. Do you think it is fair to us to put the price back so that we will lose money, or shall we leave our feed lots empty? All feeders are trying to help win this war, but we cannot stand this price fluctuation. I feed 200 head of cattle and 1,600 sheep; also run 650 cattle on range. Quit meddling with prices and we will produce our share.

HARLEN MCLEOD.

LINN, KANS., May 31, 1943.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER:

We urge that you put all your influence and power in the rescinding of the 10 percent roll-back on butter.

WASHINGTON COUNTY CO-OP CREAMERY CO.

MORE FOOD OR SHORTER RATIONS

Months ago I called attention to what I felt sure was the fact—that the farm problem had become a food problem.

There are indications that Washington at last has come to realize this fact.

I understand plans are under way to shift the emphasis from prices to production in the field of food.

It is high time that shift was made.

If it becomes necessary to discard the Office of Price Administration, or to change its name and its objectives, the quicker the change is made the better.

The Office of Price Administration program, so far as the public is concerned, has been to tell the consumers they are entitled to cheap foods. The Office of Price Administration's purpose is to get lower food prices.

FOOD PRODUCTION IS MOST VITAL

What the Government should be explaining to the consumers today is that unless food production in the United States this year is greater than now appears probable, the people of the United States are going to go on short rations before the end of this year; certainly in 1944. And I really mean short rations.

In the Department of Agriculture this fact has been known for months. But the Department apparently has been unable to convince the other agencies that getting food is more important than fixing prices on food—prices based on much lower costs of production than prevail today; prices based on food surpluses instead of food scarcity.

But the Administration has insisted upon following a Pollyanna policy in regard to food production and farm help, farm machinery, farm prices. Consumers have been given to understand the problem of food was virtually only a matter of prices. The main idea was to keep the so-called "greedy farmers" from getting too much for what they produced.

LAST 3 YEARS ABOVE NORMAL

Those acquainted with the situation have been aware all the time that the last 3 years have been unusual years, years of abundant production. The weather was right all the way through, taking the country as a whole. Yields were bountiful. Feed grains and forage were produced in abundance for feeding dairy cattle, beef cattle, hogs, sheep, chickens. There were marked shortages of protein feeds for chickens and livestock. But the average consumer did not associate that with the food he took from the grocery.

We are told—and took pride in the fact we were able to do that much for our Allies—that this year one-fourth of the beef produced would go abroad. But it was rather slurred over that mathematically this meant only three-fourths the beef would be available in the United States.

We were told that one-third of the eggs laid would be needed abroad. But as consumers few persons tumbled to the fact that meant only two-thirds of the eggs would be available for home consumption. And so on down the line—one-half the cheese and one-half the evaporated milk; more than one-third the dried fruits; one-fourth of edible fats and oils, one-third of the lard; and so on.

But amounts to be shipped abroad did not, and do not now, tell the whole story. The Government is trying to lay up reserve stocks of food to feed reconquered lands in north Africa and later in Europe. These plans made during the fall and winter were based upon the supposition that 1943 farm production would exceed, or at least be as large as that of 1942.

ADVERSE CONDITIONS THIS SPRING

That part of picture already has changed, and changed for the worse.

In the Northwest and Midwest, late spring has delayed plantings dangerously, especially considering shortages of manpower and machinery.

In Florida and Georgia frosts this spring have delayed and seriously damaged the potato crop and many vegetables. Fruit crops over much of the South will be below normal, in some places much below normal.

The pig crop in the Corn Belt, through a combination of protein feed shortages, late winter, and inexperienced and inadequate help, has taken severe losses.

It is a little early to say for sure about wheat, but all reports I get indicate the probability that it will not be a bumper crop; that it may even be a short crop.

SURPLUS WHEAT IS VANISHING

From the fact that the Department of Agriculture is advising against the policy of feeding wheat to animals, except where storage space is inadequate, I take it the experts can see that 2-year supply of surplus wheat vanishing weekly. I think it was last fall when I told you the way things were going then, wheat and more wheat would be needed by 1944.

I do not like to keep crying "wolf," but as I see the picture the time has come—actually the best time has passed—for the administration to revise sharply and almost completely its food, price, and farm policies.

I say we are going to need every ounce of food that can be produced and made available for consumption.

It is all right, and very proper, for speakers to go on the air and call for more food production. That is an essential part of the program of education. But food is not produced, any more than wars are finally won, by radio broadcasts.

EXCESS PRODUCTION MORE EXPENSIVE

It takes men, and machinery, and fertilizer, and prices to cover production costs, to produce food. To produce food in excess of ordinary production, it takes more of all these; the administration should remember that excess production generally is higher cost production.

Now all the factors are not on the down side in this food situation.

The manpower situation is somewhat improved over what it was last fall, and considerably improved over what was then indicated.

The farm machinery situation remains bad, but the War Production Board is indicating more allowance will be made for farm machinery production for 1944. Last summer the allocations were for only 23 percent of 1940 production to be made in 1943. That has been raised to 40 percent; may be 80 percent for 1944. It ought to be 100 percent.

It has been my opinion for some time that the farm price policies attempted to be effectuated by the Office of Price Administration, and by the Office of Economic Stabilization, have been decidedly inflationary instead of what they were intended to be—anti-inflationary.

Any policy or program that discourages and decreases production, that complicates and breaks down the machinery of distribution, is inflationary in character, and in an emergency like this, also very dangerous.

CHESTER DAVIS IS SAWING WOOD

I think there is going to be a decided change in the manner of handling food production and control within a comparatively short time.

Chester Davis, the new food administrator, has noticeably not been on the air; he has not been doing much talking. My information from the Department of Agriculture is that he has been—to use an old phrase—just sawing wood.

Members of Congress from the farm States at present are watching this situation closely. We are interested in winning the war. We know that maximum food production is necessary to win the war. The troubles we have been having off and on for months past here in Washington have been largely efforts to get the administration to see the real need is maximum production.

It would be too bad, just when our military forces are going so good, to have the war machinery at home slowed down by monkey wrenches thrown into it by the mistaken farm, food, and price policies.

FOOD AS NECESSARY AS ARMS

I hope Chester Davis succeeds in getting the food-production program straightened out. But along with that someone is going to have to make it plain to consumers that food production is just as much a war necessity as arms production—and now that the arms-production program is working at top speed, it is more than ever necessary that food production be stepped up, not allowed to lag when the need for food is so great.

To farmers, I urge that you plant and harvest and produce every ounce of food you possibly can, including meat and dairy products. Your country needs it.

To consumers, conserve every ounce of food. Don't waste it. And do everything you can to make it possible for farmers to produce more.

To producers and consumers alike—if there is a way for you to produce some of your own food in a Victory garden—or any kind of a garden—do just that thing.

Your country needs food—and so do you.

Mr. CAPPER. In my letter to Administrator Brown, Mr. President, I have suggested that he abandon the program of using subsidies to hold down food prices. The plan, I am certain, will not work, and I have so told Mr. Brown.

For the purpose of encouraging the production of certain risk crops in unusual quantities, there may be some justification for making so-called incentive payments or bonuses. This would be for the purpose of securing needed increased production.

However, to borrow billions of dollars to subsidize food prices so that consumers, with more spending power than ever before, may get their food at less than cost would simply add fuel to the inflation conflagration well under way. I am convinced that this subsidy and rollback program will not work; it is merely adding to the confusion and discouraging production.

NOMINATION OF GUY DOANE McKINNEY

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the acting majority leader. I notice under the heading of "War Manpower Commission" on the Executive Calendar the nomination of Guy Doane McKinney from the District of Columbia, to be principal information specialist, at $5,600 per annum, in the Washington regional office. May I inquire if that is the State of Washington?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I should say it is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BONE. I should like to have the nomination passed over until I can ascertain whether it is for the city of Washington, D. C., or the State of Washington.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will move an executive session, and will then ask that that nomination be passed over until we can check it.

Mr. BONE. I want the nomination to go over until I can ascertain who is being appointed in my State.

Mr. HILL. On the face of it, I think this appointment is in the District of Columbia. I will say to the Senator that we will agree that the nomination may go over until the Senator has had an opportunity to investigate it.

Mr. BONE. I should like to have the RECORD show that I want the nomination go over in the event it comes up again when I am not present.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will yield, I will move that the Senate go into executive session at once.

Mr. BONE. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting a nomination in the Coast Guard, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Finance:

Abe D. Waldauer, of Memphis, Tenn., to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 43, with headquarters at Memphis, Tenn. (reappointment).

By Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Sundry officers of the Naval Reserve for appointment and/or promotion, and sundry officers for promotion in the Navy.

By Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

WAR MANPOWER COMMISSION

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the War Manpower Commission.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask that all nominations in the War Manpower Commission be confirmed en bloc with the exception of the nomination of Guy Doane McKinney. As to that nomination I request that it go over at the suggestion and request of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE].

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, for the purpose of the RECORD let me say that I will rise on this floor and object to every appointment in my State unless the bureaus at least do me the honor of calling me up and asking me if I know the nominees. I hope I shall have some help from my brethren, who certainly should be fed up with this kind of business at this time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am quite sure, from an examination of the calendar, that this appointment in the Washington regional office is in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. If the Senator will examine the calendar, he will note that in the column in which the name "Washington" appears all the names there are names of cities, including Atlanta, Canton, Lincoln, Kansas City, Boston, and so on down the list. They are all names of cities, so I am confident that the appointment referred to by the Senator from Washington is not in the State of Washington, but in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

However, I am willing that the nomination of Guy Doane McKinney be passed over temporarily.

Mr. BONE. If it be true that his appointment applies to the city of Washington, I would have no objection.

Mr. HILL. I am confident that that is the case. The calendar strongly indicates it.

Mr. BONE. I am serving notice now, however, that I will not agree to the confirmation of the nomination of any person appointed in my State until the departments let me know in advance who the person is. I want that statement to appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HILL. I will say to the Senator from Washington that the calendar not only strongly indicates, but practically shows, that this man is an appointee in the city of Washington, and not in the State of Washington.

These nominations come under the jurisdiction of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. They were reported by that committee. That committee has a rule—and I think that rule is strictly adhered to—that it will not report any nomination in any State without first consulting the Senator or Senators from that State and obtaining their approval of the nomination.

Mr. BONE. The language used in the calendar is "Washington regional office." I have no means of knowing whether that refers to the State of Washington, or the city of Washington in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HILL. I invite the attention of the Senator to the language in the nomination above that of Mr. McKinney—"in the Kansas City regional office." I am sure that his nomination is in the District of Columbia, and not the State of Washington.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs which handles these nominations. I yield to him.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am positive that the name referred to would not be on the calendar if the person came from the State of Washington, unless the Senator from Washington had first approved the nomination. We have an understanding that no appointment will come from that committee to the Senate for confirmation unless the appointment has been approved by the Senator in whose State the appointment is to be made. Some Senators have declined to show any interest in such nominations if they have no voice in the appointments. We have an understanding in the committee that no nomination will be reported to the Senate unless the Senator in whose State the appointment is to be made approves the nomination. I will not guarantee it, but I am reasonably certain that if the name had been from the State of the Senator from Washington it would not be on the calendar without his approval.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, let me say to my good friend from Kentucky that appointment after appointment has been made of men in my State to positions calling upon the appointees to lay down rules of human conduct and establish policies. I have never before heard of some of these men. So far as it lies in my power I will not stand for this practice any longer. I think it is time for Senators who are interested—and most of them are—to put an end to this kind of business. I am tired of being blamed for the acts of men over whose conduct I have no control. If I am to accept any fragment of responsibility for their existence in those jobs, I want to know who they are before they are appointed. I think it is time for Senators to determine in their own minds to follow that course.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations in the War Manpower Commission be confirmed en bloc, with the exception of the nomination of Guy Doane McKinney to be principal information specialist in the Washington regional office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LUCAS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nominations are confirmed with the exception stated.

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the United States Public Health Service.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Public Health Service nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the postmaster nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the postmaster nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the Executive Calendar.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of all confirmations of today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be forthwith notified.

RECESS

Mr. HILL. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, June 2, 1943, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JUNE 1, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we rejoice that divine love which blooms fadelessly in Gethsemane, shines in the crown of thorns. In the presence of Calvary, we pray that selfishness and strife may die and that we shall neither guess nor fear, nor be found unworthy to stand and serve our country. Storms bursting on the battle lines, whatever they may engulf, they cannot swallow the might of the human spirit—praises be unto Thy holy name.

Blessed Lord and Master, Thou hast vehemently affirmed the glory of self-sacrifice and rebuked selfishness, teaching us hopefully to identify ourselves with a sinning, suffering world; no heart is pure that is not passionate and no virtue is safe in indifference. In the name of Him by whose stripes we are healed, we beseech Thee that this indulgent generation may know of the grace of our Lord, who, though He was rich for our sakes He became poor and gave us the sublime manifestation of humble service. As a great Nation, we have not been made for the ends of wealth, luxury, and pleasure, but to help Lazarus at the gates of all peoples. O summon us to trial and endurance for the sake of those who are in the mad delirium of famine, persecution, inquisition, murder, and death. Lord God of hosts, lead us on in the power of magnitude, energy, and in the splendour of a mighty Union, and thus we shall fulfill our high destiny. In the name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 28, 1943, was read and approved.

"(2) Tax for 1942 greater than that for 1943: In the case of a taxpayer whose liability for the tax for the taxable year 1942 is discharged under subsection (b) and whose surtax net income for the base year plus $20,000 is less than that for the taxable year 1943, the tax imposed by Chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code for the taxable year 1943 shall be increased by the excess of 75 per centum of the tax imposed by such chapter for the taxable year 1943 (determined without regard to this section and without regard to interest and additions to the tax) over a tentative tax for the taxable year 1943 computed as if the portion of the surtax net income for such taxable year which is not greater than the sum of the surtax net income for the base year plus $20,000 constituted both the surtax net income for the taxable year 1943, and the net income for such taxable year after allowance of all credits against net income.

"For the purposes of this subsection 'base year' means any one of the taxable years 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940, to be selected by the taxpayer.

"(2) Joint returns: If the taxpayer either for the taxable year 1942 or for the taxable year 1943 makes a joint return with his spouse, the taxes of the spouses for the taxable year for which a joint return is not made shall be aggregated for the purposes of subsections (a), (b), and (c), and in case the taxable year for which a joint return is not made is the taxable year 1943, the liability for the increase in the tax for the taxable year 1943 under subsections (b) and (c) shall be joint and several.

"(4) Section 107 income attributed to base year: That portion of the compensation which is received or accrued in the taxable year 1942 (if the tax for such year is not greater than that for the taxable year 1943), or in the taxable year 1943 (if the tax for such year is less than that for the taxable year 1942), and which under section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code is attributed to the base year, shall for the purposes of subsection (c) be excluded in computing the surtax net income for the taxable year 1942 or 1943, as the case may be, and be included in computing the surtax net income for the base year.

"(5) Partnership business formerly operated as corporation: If, during the base year of any individual, such individual was a shareholder in a corporation and if substantially all of the assets of such corporation were at any time prior to May 1, 1943, acquired by such individual or a partnership of which he is a partner pursuant to the complete liquidation of such corporation, and if at all times after such liquidation up to and including the taxable year 1942 (if subsection (a) is applicable) or the taxable year 1943 (if subsection (b) is applicable) the trade or business of such corporation was carried on by such individual or partnership, for the purposes of subsection (c) such individual may compute his surtax net income for the base year as if the earnings and profits of the corporation for the taxable year ending with or within the base year had all been distributed as dividends at the end of such taxable year. If the interest of such individual in the partnership is proportionately less than his interest in the corporation, his distributive share of such dividends shall for the purposes of this paragraph be adjusted to reflect such difference.

"(6) Certain portions of increase in 1943 tax not part of estimated tax: The amount by which the tax for the taxable year 1943 is increased under subsection (a), (b) (2), or (c) shall not be considered to be a part of the tax for such taxable year for the purposes of sections 58, 59, 60, and 294 (a) (3), (4) and (5) of the Internal Revenue Code.

"(7) Taxpayer dying in taxable year 1942: If the individual dies during the taxable year 1942, subsections (a) (b), and (c) shall not apply.

"(e) Extension of time for payment of portions of increase in 1943 tax:

"(1) Twenty-five per centum increase under subsection (a) or (b): At the election of the taxpayer, made under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, the Commissioner shall, except as hereinafter provided, extend the time for the payment of the portion of the tax for the taxable year 1943 equal to one-half of the amount of the 25 per centum increase therein under subsection (a) or (b) (2) for the taxable year 1943, in which case such portion shall be paid on or before the fifteenth day of the fifteenth month following the close of the taxable year. The Commissioner may condition the extension upon the furnishing by the taxpayer of a bond in such amount, not exceeding the amount with respect to which the extension applies, with such surety or sureties, as the Commissioner deems necessary, conditioned upon the payment of such amount in accordance with the terms of the extension. If such amount is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable, it shall be paid upon notice and demand from the Collector. If such amount is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable, there shall be collected, as a part of the tax, interest on such amount at the rate of 6 per centum per annum for the period beginning with the date on which such amount is payable and ending with the date on which it is paid.

"(2) Increase under subsection (c): At the election of the taxpayer, made under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, the Commissioner shall, except as hereinafter provided, extend the time for the payment of the portion of the tax for the taxable year 1943 equal to the increase therein under subsection (c), in which case such portion shall be paid in four equal annual installments, the first of which shall be paid on the fifteenth day of the fifteenth month following the close of the taxable year, and of the remaining installments one of which shall be paid on the last day of each succeeding twelve-month period, except that any installment may be paid prior to the date prescribed for its payment. The Commissioner may condition the extension upon the furnishing by the taxpayer of a bond in such amount not exceeding the amount of such increase, with such surety or sureties, as the Commissioner deems necessary, conditioned upon the payment of such amount in accordance with the terms of the extension. If the time for the payment of such portion is extended, there shall be collected, as a part of the tax, interest on each installment at the rate of 4 per centum per annum for the period beginning with the date prescribed for the payment of the tax for such taxable year and ending with the date on which such installment is paid or the date on which it is payable, whichever is the earlier. If any installment is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable, it and the remaining installments shall be paid upon notice and demand from the Collector. If any installment is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable, there shall be collected, as part of the tax, interest on such installment at the rate of 6 per centum per annum for the period beginning with the date on which such installment is payable and ending with the date on which it is paid.

"(f) Treatment of payments on account of 1942 tax. Any payment (other than interest and additions to the tax) made on account of the tax imposed by Chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code for the taxable year 1942 upon a taxpayer whose liability for such tax is discharged under subsection (a) or (b) shall be considered as payment on account of the estimated tax for the taxable year 1943. In the case of any extension of time for the payment of such tax granted by the Commissioner prior to September 1, 1943, payment of the portion thereof which if such extension had not been granted would have been payable under section 56 (b) prior to such date shall be made notwithstanding subsection (a) or (b), but the foregoing provisions of this subsection shall apply to any such payment. In case the taxpayer becomes delinquent, prior to September 1, 1943, in the payment of such tax or any installment thereof, subsection (a) or (b) shall not relieve the taxpayer of his liability for the tax, but the foregoing provisions of this subsection shall be applicable to payment of such liability. If any payment on account of the tax imposed by such chapter for the taxable year 1942 is made pursuant to a joint return made by husband and wife for such taxable year, and such payment is considered as a payment on account of the estimated tax for the taxable year 1943, such payment may be treated as a payment on account of the estimated tax of either the husband or the wife for such taxable year or may be divided between them.

"(g) Use of term "Taxable Year". For the purposes of this section the terms "taxable year 1937", "taxable year 1938", "taxable year 1939", "taxable year 1940", "taxable year 1942", and "taxable year 1943" mean, respectively, the taxable year beginning in 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1942, and 1943, respectively; and "taxable year" as applied to the taxable year 1942 or 1943 shall not include any period of less than twelve months unless occasioned by the death of the taxpayer or unless there is no taxable year of twelve months beginning in such calendar year.

"(h) Regulations. This section shall be applied in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

"SEC. 7. Additional allowance for members of armed forces.

"(a) In general. Section 22 (b) (13) of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to additional allowance for military and naval personnel in computing net income) is amended to read as follows:

"'(13) Additional allowance for military and naval personnel. In the case of compensation received during any taxable year and before the termination of the present war as proclaimed by the President, by a member of the military or naval forces of the United States for active service in such forces during such war, or by a citizen or resident of the United States who is a member of the military or naval forces of any of the other United Nations for active service in such forces during such war, so much of such compensation as does not exceed $1,500,'

"(b) Effective date. The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1942.

"SEC. 8. Abatement of tax for members of armed forces upon death.

"Chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by inserting after section 404 the following new supplement:

"'Supplement U—Abatement of tax for members of armed forces upon death.

"'SEC. 421. Abatement of tax for members of armed forces upon death.

"In the case of any individual who dies on or after December 7, 1941, while in active service as a member of the military or naval forces of the United States or of any of the other United Nations and prior to the termination of the present war as proclaimed by the President, the tax imposed by this chapter shall not apply with respect to the taxable year in which falls the date of his death, and the tax under this chapter and under the corresponding title of each prior revenue law for preceding taxable years which is unpaid at the date of his death (including interest, additions to the tax, and additional amounts) shall not be assessed, and if assessed the assessment shall be abated, and if collected shall be credited or refunded as an overpayment."

"SEC. 9. Assistant commissioners.

"Subchapter B of Chapter 39 of the Internal Revenue Code as amended to read as follows:

"'SUBCHAPTER B—ASSISTANT COMMISSIONERS

"'SEC. 3905. Appointment.

"'There shall be in the Bureau of Internal Revenue two Assistant Commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"'SEC. 3906. Duties.

"'The Assistant Commissioners shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Commissioner or required by law.'

"SEC. 10. Extension of time in connection with release of powers of appointment.

"Section 403 (d) (3) of the Revenue Act of 1942 is amended by striking out 'July 1, 1943' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof 'March 1, 1944'; and section 452 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1942 is amended to read as follows:

"'(c) Release before March 1, 1944:

"'(1) A release of a power to appoint before March 1, 1944, shall not be deemed a transfer of property by the individual possessing such power.

"'(2) This subsection shall apply to all calendar years prior to 1944 and to that part of the calendar year 1944 prior to March 1, 1944.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2570) to provide for the current payment of the individual income tax, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

COLLECTION OF INCOME TAX AT SOURCE ON WAGES

Description of House and Senate bills

Part II of subchapter D of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code provides for collection at the source of a tax of 5 percent on the excess of all wages paid on or after January 1, 1943, over a specific exemption of $624. The amount of tax collected at source under this provision is allowed as a credit against Victory tax and any excess thereof over the Victory tax imposed under part I of subchapter D is allowed as a credit against other income taxes imposed under chapter 1. Section 2 of the House bill would amend part II of subchapter D to provide for collection of a tax at source on wages paid on or after July 1, 1943, at a rate of 3 percent upon the excess of the wages paid over a specific exemption of $624 and a rate of 17 percent (which was designed to approximate the yield of the normal tax and the first-bracket surtax on such wages) upon the excess over a withholding exemption, the amount of which depended on the employee's family status. Thus, the combined rates approximated the net Victory tax, the normal tax, and the first-bracket surtax on such wages. In lieu of withholding at the flat percentage rates on the excess of the wages over the exemptions, employers were granted an option to withhold a tax determined under tables provided in the bill under which the two portions of the tax were combined into a single amount to be withheld from each wage payment.

The Senate bill adopts the basic system of collection at source as provided in the House bill but makes a number of technical changes which are explained below. Under the bill as passed by the Senate, the methods of collection, payment, and administration of the withholding tax were coordinated generally with those applicable to the social security tax imposed on employees under section 1400 of the code. This proposal was made in order to facilitate the work of both the Government and the employer in administering the withholding system. Accordingly, section 2 of the Senate bill places the 20 percent withholding provisions in a new subchapter D of chapter 9 of the code. The new subchapter is entitled "Collection of Income Tax at Source on Wages." This amendment requires a change in the numbering of the various sections discussed below. This system of collection of income tax at source, like other income-tax laws, will apply in the Virgin Islands.

Definitions

Subchapter D under the bill as passed by the Senate consists of sections 1621 to 1627, inclusive. Section 1621 provides definitions of the more important terms used in subchapter D. The general definition of the term "wages" contained in section 1621 (a) is the same as that contained in the House bill and in section 465 (a) of the code. The term is generally defined to include all remuneration whether designated as salary, wages, fees, commissions, etc., and whether paid in cash or property, if paid for services performed by an employee for his employer. Certain of the exceptions provided in existing law with respect to remuneration paid for given types of services are continued in identical language. These exceptions, numbered to conform to the bill, include remuneration paid (2) for agricultural labor as defined in section 1426 (h); (3) for domestic service in a private home, local college club, or local chapter of a college fraternity or sorority; and (4) for casual labor not in the course of the employer's trade or business.

Exception (1) relates to remuneration paid for services performed as a member of the military or naval forces of the United States, other than pensions and retired pay includible in gross income. The addition of the expression "includible in gross income under Chapter 1," is a clerical change required by a further clerical change in section 1622 (a) from the provisions of the corresponding section 466 (a) of the code.

The exception provided with respect to remuneration for services performed for a foreign government or instrumentality thereof was amended in the Senate bill (exception (5)) to make clear that the exception extends to remuneration paid to employees by the Commonwealth of the Philippines. The exception was also amended to make certain that the services must be performed for the particular government, or branch of such government.

The exception provided in existing law for services as an employee of a nonresident alien individual, foreign partnership, or foreign corporation, if such alien or foreign entity is not engaged in trade or business within the United States, was eliminated. In many cases, although not engaged in trade or business in the United States, such employers do have an office or place of business therein or agents by whom wages are paid to citizen or resident employees in the United States. The amendment requires the tax to be withheld in such cases.

Section 1621 (a) (6) provides an exception for remuneration paid for services performed by a nonresident alien individual other than a resident of a contiguous country who enters and leaves the United States at frequent intervals. This is the same clerical change as that made in the House bill from a similar exception relating to the requirement of withholding contained in section 466 (a) of the code. The effect of this exception is generally to exclude from withholding all nonresident alien individuals who are subject to withholding under the provisions of section 143 of the code. By express provision, the exception does not extend to residents of a contiguous country who enter and leave the United States at frequent intervals. Thus residents of Canada and Mexico falling in such category who are employed within and receive remuneration for services performed within the United States will be subject to withholding under the provisions of the bill. Such persons are subject to the tax imposed by sections 11, 12, and 450 of the code, the same as in the case of citizens of the United States, upon the wages received for services performed within the United States and are not presently subject to withholding with respect to compensation for personal services under section 143.

Many persons falling within the category of residents of a contiguous country who enter and leave the United States at frequent intervals are employed by American railroads and steamship companies in transportation service which involves crossing and recrossing the border at frequent intervals. These and similar cases have many complicating factors and are not susceptible of appropriate treatment by rigid statutory rules. In addition, the exception of this general category of nonresident aliens from withholding under section 143 with respect to compensation rests within the discretion of the Commissioner. Accordingly, exception (7) authorizes the Commissioner to provide exceptions from withholding for such individuals under regulations prescribed with the approval of the Secretary.

Exception (8), relating to services performed while outside the United States, is a clarification of existing law designed to facilitate the use of certain presumptions in determining whether the major part of the services for an employer during the calendar year is to be performed outside the United States.

Exception (9) is a new provision excepting from the definition of "wages" remuneration paid for services performed as a minister of the gospel.

Section 1621 (a), relating to the definition of "wages," makes clear that the exception provided in paragraph (8) thereof with respect to services performed outside the United States does not extend to wages paid for services performed on an American vessel or upon any vessel as an employee of the United States employed through the War Shipping Administration. Hence, withholding is required upon the wages paid to (1) employees performing services on or in connection with an American vessel (as defined in section 1426 (g) of the code) under a contract of service which is entered into within the United States or during the performance of which the vessel touches at a port in the United States and (2) employees serving on or in connection with any vessel as an employee of the United States employed through the War Shipping Administration. This is in accordance with present administrative practice under existing law.

The term "pay-roll period" is defined in section 1621 (b) and is identical with that contained in the House bill and in section 465 (a) of the code. The Senate bill, however, added a definition of the term "miscellaneous pay-roll period." This term embraces any period for which a payment of wages is ordinarily made to the employee by his employer other than a weekly, biweekly, semimonthly, monthly, quarterly, semiannual, or annual payroll period. Thus, if an employer's ordinary practice is to pay his employees for periods of 10 days, such 10-day periods are miscellaneous pay-roll periods.

Section 1621 (c) defines the term "employee" in the same terms as the House bill and section 465 (d) of the code.

Sections 465 (c) and (e) of the code contains definitions of the terms "withholding agent" and "employer," respectively. Under the House bill and under the bill as passed by the Senate, the definition of withholding agent has been eliminated. Both bills generally define the term "employer" to mean the person for whom an individual performs or performed any service, of whatever nature, as the employee of such person. This general definition is not adequate, however, to cover certain special cases, such as the case where the local agent of a nonresident alien individual, foreign partnership, or foreign corporation pays wages to a citizen or resident of the United States, and the case of the person making payment of wages in situations where the wage payments are not under the control of the person for whom the services are or were performed, as, for instance, in the case of certain types of pension payments. The House bill provided for these cases by an exception to the general definition of the term "employer" which provided that if the wages are paid by a person other than the person for whom the services are or were performed, the term "employer" means the person paying such wages. The Senate bill has restated the exception in order to make clear that it is designed solely to meet unusual situations and not intended as a departure from the basic purpose to centralize responsibility for withholding, returning, and paying the tax and furnishing receipts.

Accordingly, the Senate bill provides in section 1621 (d) (1) that if the person for whom the services are or were performed does not have control of the payment of the wages for such services the term "employer" means the person having control of the payment of such wages. Section 1621 (d) (2) provides that in the case of a person who pays wages on behalf of a nonresident alien individual, foreign partnership, or foreign corporation, which is not engaged in trade or business within the United States the term "employer" means the person who pays the wages.

As stated, section 1621 (d) makes it clear that the responsibility for withholding, paying, and returning the tax and furnishing receipts rests with the employer, except as otherwise specifically provided in section 1624. In the case of a corporate employer having branch offices, the branch manager or other representative may actually, as a matter of internal administration, withhold the tax or prepare the receipts required under section 1625, but the responsibility and legal duty for withholding, paying, and returning the tax and furnishing the receipts rests with the corporate employer.

Under the bill as passed by the Senate, the tax required to be collected at the source is based upon the excess of the wage payment over the amount of the withholding exemption provided in section 1622 (b). The amount of the withholding exemption in a specific case is in general dependent upon the status of the individual employee as single, married, etc.; upon the number of his dependents; and, in the case of an employed married person whose spouse is also employed, the amount of the withholding exemption claimed by each spouse. In all cases the withholding exemption will be determined by the employer upon the basis of the information relative to status set forth in a withholding exemption certificate required to be furnished by the employees. Accordingly, definitions have been provided in sections 1621 (e) to (k), inclusive, for the purpose of enabling the employer to determine the status of wage earners with respect to the withholding exemption. Under these definitions, which are identical in all but one respect with those contained in the House bill, the terms "single person," "married person," "head of a family," and "dependent," have the meanings assigned to such terms for the purpose of the personal exemption and credit for dependents in section 25 and the regulations prescribed thereunder, but the application of the appropriate amount of withholding exemption in each case depends upon the furnishing of a withholding exemption certificate stating that the individual occupies the described status or is entitled to the withholding exemption with respect to dependents. If no certificate setting forth the status of the employee is furnished, no withholding exemption is allowed; and tax will be withheld upon the gross amount of the wage payment. If husband and wife are both employed, each may claim one-half of the withholding exemption allowed a married person or they may agree to allow one spouse to claim all of the withholding exemption, and the other spouse to claim none of the withholding exemption. The option in such case extends only to the withholding exemption allowed a married person which under the definition is termed the "personal exemption for withholding."

The withholding exemption provided with respect to dependents must be claimed by the spouse who furnishes the chief support for such dependent whether or not such spouse claims any part of the personal exemption for withholding. In the case of the head of a family having one or more dependents, one of such dependents is to be omitted in determining the number of dependents for the purpose of the withholding exemption with respect to dependents. The only respect in which the Senate bill differs from these provisions in the House bill is that the former proposes to qualify the definition of the term "married person claiming half of the personal exemption for withholding" contained in subsection (h) so that such amount of the personal exemption for withholding shall apply only where the withholding exemption certificate expressly states that for the purposes of the tax collected at the source on wages the employee's spouse is claiming not more than one-half of the personal exemption for withholding. This change is designed to bring this definition in line with the definition of "married person claiming all of personal exemption for withholding"

Requirement of Withholding

The House bill expressed the withholding requirement in terms of two portions of the tax required to be collected at source. The portion required to be withheld at the rate of 17 percent was based upon the excess of the wage payment over the amount of a withholding exemption which approximated the personal exemption of the wage earner under the regular income tax plus credit for dependents plus 10 percent of such exemption and credit, the combined amounts being prorated in accordance with the length of the particular pay-roll period. The portion required to be withheld at the rate of 8 percent was based upon the excess of each wage payment over the prorated withholding exemption of $624 provided for Victory tax purposes. Thus, the employer would first apply one withholding exemption and rate to each payment of wages, then he would apply another withholding exemption and rate to such payment, and by adding the two results would arrive at the total amount of tax to be withheld. This amount would approximate the net Victory tax, the normal tax, and the first-bracket surtax on such wages.

The Senate bill is designed to achieve this same objective of withholding on wages an amount approximating the net Victory tax, the normal tax, and the first-bracket surtax on such wages, but it is so framed that the employer will not be required to make two separate computations and add the result of each in order to arrive at the amount of tax required to be withheld from any one employee.

To accomplish this objective of simplifying the work of employers, section 1622 under the Senate bill changes the aggregate withholding exemption of $552 for single persons provided in the House bill to $624; the withholding exemption of $1,320 for married persons to $1,248; and the withholding exemption of $408 for each dependent to $312. These amounts are termed the family status withholding exemptions. Withholding would then be applied at the single rate of 20 percent on all amounts paid in excess of these exemptions, prorated in accordance with the length of the pay-roll period. The Senate bill provides, however, that in no case may the tax to be withheld be less than 3 percent of the amount of the wages for each pay-roll period in excess of the prorated $624 Victory tax exemption.

The reason for the provision in section 1622 (a) that the amount to be withheld shall in no event be less than 3 percent of the amount in excess of the Victory tax withholding exemption is that the family status withholding exemption of a wage earner might equal or exceed the amount of his wages so that no withholding for normal tax and first-bracket surtax should take place, while at the same time his Victory tax withholding exemption might be less than the amount of his wages so that withholding for Victory tax purposes should take place. In other words, the provision is necessary to insure withholding for Victory tax purposes in the case of single persons with dependents having incomes between $624 and the applicable exemption under the 20-percent withholding, which ranges upward from $624 depending on the number of dependents, and in the case of married persons or heads of family with incomes between $624 and the applicable exemption under the 20-percent withholding, which ranges upward from $1,248 depending on the number of dependents. To illustrate: John Smith is a married person claiming the whole of the personal exemption for withholding and has one dependent. His weekly wage is $30. His weekly family status withholding exemption is $30 ($24 because he is a married person claiming the whole of the personal exemption for withholding, plus $6 because of his one dependent). Since his weekly family status withholding exemption equals the amount of his weekly wage, there will be no withholding for normal tax and first-bracket surtax purposes. However, John Smith's weekly Victory tax withholding exemption is $12, and since his weekly wage is $30, he has a Victory tax liability, and his employer will withhold $0.54 (3 percent of $18).

The specific wage levels at which only the 3-percent rate is applicable are readily ascertainable, and the Commissioner's regulations can furnish a list of those levels so that employers will not need to make computations in order to determine whether the 3-percent or full 20-percent rate is applicable. For example, a married person with one dependent who claims all of the personal exemption for withholding and who receives less than $33.18 a week will be subject only to a withholding tax of 3 percent on the amount received in excess of the prorated $624 Victory tax exemption. For all such persons receiving a weekly wage of $33.18 or over the rate of withholding will be 20 percent on the amount in excess of the applicable family status withholding exemption.

Under the Victory tax withholding provisions the liability for withholding is placed upon the person having control of the payment of wages. Section 1622, under the Senate bill, like the House bill, specifically designates the "employer" as the person required to withhold and collect the tax. This is a clarifying change. A clerical amendment in the House bill eliminated the provision in section 466 (a) which restricts the withholding to wages includible in gross income. The same change is made in the Senate bill. This limitation, which was designed to exclude from withholding the amount of any wage payment exempted under the law from the tax imposed by chapter 1 of the code, is rendered unnecessary by the changes made in the definition of the term "wages." The phrase "to any individual" was stricken from the requirement of withholding in order to avoid any implication that withholding should not apply merely because wages are received by a corporation, such as a corporate executor of a deceased employee.

Withholding Exemption

The amount of the withholding exemption applicable with respect to any payment of wages is determined under the provisions of section 1622 (b) under the Senate bill. The House bill changed the term "withholding deduction" contained in the Victory tax provisions to "withholding exemption" in order to avoid confusion. The latter designation is also used in the Senate bill. For convenience of reference, the withholding exemption allowable in computing tax at the 20-percent rate has, in the Senate bill, been designated the "family status withholding exemption" and that allowable in computing tax at the 3-percent rate the "Victory tax withholding exemption." The amount of the withholding exemption applicable to all wage payments is determined under the schedules provided in section 1622 (b) and the rules relative to the application of such schedules in certain types of cases are provided in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (b). The schedule of family status withholding exemptions applicable for the purpose of the 20-percent rate provided in subsection (a) (1) is as follows:

Family status withholding exemption

Payroll period	Single person	Married person claiming whole of personal exemption for withholding or head of family	Married person claiming half of personal exemption for withholding	Married person claiming none of personal exemption for withholding	Each dependent, other than the first dependent in the case of the head of a family
Weekly	$12.00	$24.00	$12.00	0	$6.00
Biweekly	24.00	48.00	24.00	0	12.00
Semimonthly	26.00	52.00	26.00	0	13.00
Monthly	52.00	104.00	52.00	0	26.00
Quarterly	156.00	312.00	156.00	0	78.00
Semiannual	312.00	624.00	312.00	0	156.00
Annual	624.00	1,248.00	624.00	0	312.00
Daily or miscellaneous (per day of such period)	1.70	3.40	1.70	0	.85

The schedule of Victory tax withholding exemptions for the withholding rate of 3 percent is as follows:

Pay-roll period:	Victory tax withholding exemption
Weekly	$12.00
Biweekly	24.00
Semimonthly	26.00
Monthly	52.00
Quarterly	156.00
Semiannual	312.00
Annual	624.00
Daily or miscellaneous (per day of such period)	1.70

The first schedule was changed in the Senate bill from that contained in the House bill, for the reasons stated above. The latter schedule is the same as that provided in section 466 (b) of the code with the exception of an additional line setting forth the amount of the withholding exemption applicable with respect to wages paid for a single day's service in the case of a daily or miscellaneous pay-roll period, and the designation, "Victory tax withholding exemption."

Except for the designation, the schedule is the same as that in the House bill. Under the rules prescribed in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the subsection, the daily or miscellaneous payroll period exemption will be used for computing the amount of the withholding exemption in the case of wages paid on a daily basis, for any period not otherwise provided for in the schedules, or for wages paid without regard to any period. For instance, in the case of wages paid for a 10-day payroll period, the amount of the withholding exemption applicable is $1.70 per day multiplied by the number of days in such period, or $17. The same rules apply to the withholding exemption schedule applicable for the purpose of computing the tax at the 20-percent rate.

The rules prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 1622 (b) are the same in substance as those provided in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 466 (b) of the code, and the same as those in the House bill. The Senate bill inserts "withholding" before "exemption." This is a clarifying change.

Paragraph (4) of section 1622 (b) is substantially the same as paragraph (2) of section 466 (b) of the code except that it is made clear that the rule there prescribed is applicable only if authorized by the Commissioner under appropriate regulations. Under this provision, if wages are paid for a period of less than a week or, in the case of wages paid without regard to any period, if the time described in paragraph (3) is less than 1 week, the employer may, if so authorized by the Commissioner, compute the amount of the tax on the basis of the excess of the wages paid during the calendar week over the withholding exemption allowable for a weekly pay-roll period. If the employer is not authorized to use such method, the tax will be based upon the excess of the wages paid, prorated on a daily basis, over the amount of the daily withholding exemption of $1.70. The application of this provision is illustrated by the following example:

If a married person (having no dependents) claiming all of the personal exemption for withholding receives in a calendar week $8 per day for 4 days, his employer may be authorized to withhold upon the amount in excess of $24 (or $8) at 20 percent, so that the total amount withheld would be $1.60. Hence, under such method withholding would apply beginning with the payment made for the fourth day, since the employee would have received $24 for the first 3 days. On the other hand, if not so authorized, the employer must use the amounts specified in the schedules for a daily or miscellaneous pay-roll period, in which case the amount withheld for each day would be 20 percent of the excess of $8 over $3.40 ($4.60), or $0.92, and the total amount withheld would be four times the latter amount, or $3.68.

Paragraph 5 of section 1622 (b) under the Senate bill is a new provision which, in order to simplify the work of the employer who withholds under the schedule method, permits him to round out the wages to the nearest dollar in computing the amount of tax to be withheld.

Paragraph (5) of section 466 (b) of the code provides that the total withholding exemption allowed an employee with respect to wages received from any one employer during the calendar year shall not exceed the amount of the withholding exemption allowable for an annual pay-roll period. This limitation operates to prevent an excessive withholding exemption and consequent underwithholding of the tax in those cases in which the employee receives regular wages plus additional wages in the form of bonuses, commissions, etc. The Senate bill, like the House bill, eliminates this paragraph as unnecessary. Under section 1622 (i) in the Senate bill, the Commissioner is vested with authority to provide appropriate rules for the determination of the withholding exemption applicable in such cases under which the withholding exemption allowed to an employee in any calendar year shall approximate the withholding exemption allowable with respect to an annual pay-roll period.

Wage Bracket Withholding

Under the provisions of section 1622 (c) under the Senate bill, employers may at their option withhold a tax determined under tables provided in such section to be deducted from each wage payment. Such tax shall be in lieu of the tax computed under the percentage rates and required to be withheld under the provisions of subsection (a). The change made in subsection (b) under the Senate bill with respect to the withholding exemption made it possible to provide one table applicable to each pay-roll period for all employees, regardless of their marital and dependency status. The resulting redesigning and reduction in the number of tables should substantially simplify the employer's task and the amounts withheld will very closely approximate the amounts which would be withheld under the more numerous tables of the House bill. Under this section, tables are provided for weekly, biweekly, semimonthly, and monthly pay-roll periods. For the convenience of employers making payment of wages for pay-roll periods other than those comprehended by the above-mentioned tables, or for periods which do not constitute a pay-roll period, or making payment of wages without regard to any particular period of time, a further table described as the table applicable to a daily pay-roll period or a miscellaneous pay-roll period is provided. Under this table the amount of the tax required to be withheld is determined by multiplying the amount of tax shown opposite the particular daily wage bracket by the number of days in the period for which wages are paid or, in the case of wages paid without regard to a period of time, by the number of days which have elapsed between such wage payments, since the date of commencement of employment during the calendar year, or January 1, of the calendar year, whichever is the later.

The rules relating to the application of the above-mentioned tables to specific types of cases are prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 1622 (c) under the Senate bill. These rules are in substance the same as those prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of section 466 (b) of the code, and are identical, apart from minor changes, with those prescribed in the House bill, for the purpose of determining the amount of the withholding exemption in cases where the tax is determined by application of the percentage rate to the wages paid. For example, if wages are paid for a period which does not constitute a pay-roll period, paragraph (2) of section 1622 (c) provides that the amount of tax to be withheld shall be computed by multiplying the tax shown opposite the appropriate wage bracket in the miscellaneous table by the number of days contained in the period for which such wages were paid. Paragraph (4) of that section provides that if wages are paid for a period of less than 1 week the employer may be authorized by the Commissioner to compute the tax under the table applicable in the case of a weekly pay-roll period. If the employer is authorized to use the table applicable to the weekly pay-roll period, the aggregate of the wages paid to the employee during the calendar week shall be considered as the weekly wage.

Paragraph 5 of section 1622 (c) under the Senate bill is a new provision which, in order to simplify the work of the employer who withholds under the table method with respect to employees whose wages exceed the highest wage bracket in any table, permits him to round out the wages to the nearest dollar in computing the amount of tax to be withheld.

Tax Paid by Recipient

Section 1622 (d) under the Senate bill is substantially the same as section 466 (d) of the code and the corresponding provision of the House bill. However, the language has been changed in order to make clear that nothing contained in the subsection should be construed to relieve the employer of the duty imposed by law to withhold and pay the tax. Under this provision, payment by the recipient of the income of the tax required to be withheld by the employer relieves the employer from payment of the tax but does not relieve him from liability for additions to the tax or penalties for failure to withhold, collect, and pay the tax in accordance with the provisions of the subchapter.

Nondeductibility of Tax

Section 1622 (e) under the Senate bill provides that the tax withheld and collected at the source on wages shall not be allowed as a deduction either to the employer or the recipient of the income in computing net income. However, provision is made by an amendment to section 35 of the code for credit for tax withheld at source in the case of the recipient of the income. This represents a clerical change from the House bill.

Refunds or Credits

Subsection (f) provides that the refund or credit of any overpayment of the tax required to be withheld and collected shall be made to the employer only to the extent that the amount of the overpayment was actually withheld and collected from the employee. The provision differs from the House bill by reason of the fact that the provisions of law applying to the social-security tax on employees under section 1400 have been made applicable. The subsection contains a cross-reference to the provision for credit or refund to recipients of income in the case of excessive withholding.

Included and Excluded Wages

Subsection (g) under the Senate bill is identical with the corresponding provision of the House bill. This subsection provides that if the remuneration paid for services performed during one-half or more of any pay-roll period constitutes wages, all the remuneration paid for such period shall be deemed to be wages; but if the remuneration paid for services performed during more than one-half of such pay-roll period does not constitute wages, then none of the remuneration paid for such period shall be deemed to be wages. The subsection has application only to remuneration paid for a period of not more than 31 consecutive days which constitutes an established pay-roll period within the meaning of the definition contained in section 1621 (b). It has no application to remuneration paid at irregular intervals or to remuneration paid without regard to any period. The 31-day limitation is intended to minimize changes in pay periods in order to avoid withholding.

Withholding Exemption Certificates

Subsection (h) of section 1622 under the Senate bill requires every employee receiving wages to furnish his employer a signed withholding exemption certificate in such form and containing such information as the Commissioner may, with the approval of the Secretary, by regulations prescribe. The purpose of the certificate is to enable the employer to determine the amount of the withholding exemption applicable to the wages of each employee or, if the employer elects under section 1622 (c) to adopt wage-bracket withholding, the amount to be withheld under that subsection. The status of the employee as single person, married person claiming all of personal exemption for withholding, married person claiming half of personal exemption for withholding, married person claiming none of personal exemption for withholding, head of family, and the dependents to be taken into account by the employer for withholding purposes, are to be determined in accordance with the certificate furnished by the employee. Once in effect a certificate is to continue in effect until another certificate furnished by the employee takes effect. If no certificate is in effect with respect to an employee, the employer is to treat such employee as a married person claiming none of the personal exemption for withholding so that with respect to such employee there will be no withholding exemption in effect. Similarly, if the employer uses the wage-bracket tables, the amounts to be withheld from the wages of an employee with respect to whom there is no withholding certificate in effect are to be determined in accordance with the tables provided in the case of a married person claiming none of the personal exemption for withholding. In case of a change of status, the employee is required to furnish a new certificate not later than 10 days after such change occurs. This is a change from the House bill, designed to make clear that in the case of a change of status the employee must furnish a new certificate showing that change.

Under the House bill, changes in the employee's withholding exemption status are permitted at any time, but it is provided that the employer shall have at least 30 days from the date of notification of a change in status before being required to give effect to such change. Under subsection (h) of the Senate bill the employer is not required to give effect to a change in status more than twice during each calendar year. The modified rule is as follows:

(1) If the employee furnishes a withholding exemption certificate after the date of commencement of employment, the certificate is to take effect with respect to the first payment of wages made on or after the first status determination date which occurs at least 30 days from the date on which such certificate is furnished. For the purposes of this provision, the status determination dates are fixed as January 1 and July 1 of each year. These provisions are a modification of those under the House bill, designed to allow employers ample time in which to adjust payroll and other accounting records to conform to the withholding exemption certificates furnished by employees after the date of commencement of employment. Wherever feasible, however, employers may give earlier effect to such certificates. (2) If the employee furnishes a withholding exemption certificate on or before the date of commencement of employment, the certificate is to take effect as of the beginning of the first payroll period ending on or after the date on which the certificate is furnished or with respect to the first payment of wages made without regard to a payroll period on or after such date.

The rules set forth under (1) above are applicable to all wage earners who are employed on July 1, 1943, when the new withholding provisions take effect. The rules under (2) above apply in the case of new employment or reemployment, after an interruption in employment with the same employer, occurring after July 1, 1943. In applying these rules in the case of an employee intermittently hired and rehired by the same employer at frequent intervals, such employee shall be deemed to have commenced his employment at the time of the first hiring.

Overlapping Pay Periods, Etc.

Section 1622 (i), under the Senate bill, authorizes the Commissioner, under regulations prescribed with the approval of the Secretary, to provide suitable rules for the determination of the withholding exemption and the application of the wage-bracket tables with respect to various types of wage payments which do not fall readily within the statutory pattern which is necessarily designed to fit the customary type of periodic wage payments. The problems intended to be covered by these regulations are those arising generally in case of supplementary payments in the form of bonuses, commissions, dismissal wages, and the like, made in addition to periodic wage payments, and payments made with respect to periods beginning in one calendar year and ending in a different calendar year. The Senate bill changed the language of the corresponding provision of the House bill in order to make clear that the purpose of this provision is to limit the withholding exemption allowed to an employee in any calendar year to an amount approximating the withholding exemption allowable with respect to an annual pay-roll period.

Payments supplementary to periodic wage payments are made in various ways. Such payments may consist of commissions or bonuses paid each pay-roll period and covering the same or different periods as the regular wage payment or they may be made without regard to any particular period. The actual payment of the supplementary remuneration may or may not coincide with an actual payment of periodic wages. Such payments of supplementary remuneration raise the problem as to the proper handling of the withholding exemption and the wage-bracket tables in order to provide for the allowance of the appropriate withholding exemption and the deduction of the appropriate amount of tax.

For example, an employee's remuneration may consist of wages paid at periodic intervals plus additional wages in the form of a bonus paid at the end of each 6-month period. If the tax required to be withheld and collected at the source is computed independently with respect to each such payment of wages, after giving effect to the withholding exemption applicable to each such payment, it is apparent that such employee will have been allowed the entire amount of the withholding exemption to which he is entitled for a full calendar year. Hence, he should not be entitled to any withholding exemption with respect to wage payments made by the same employer during the balance of the calendar year. The same result would obtain if the tax on the periodic wage payments was withheld under the table applicable to such periods and the tax on the bonus was withheld on the percentage basis after allowance of the amount of the withholding exemption applicable to a 6-month period. It is obviously more desirable to have the withholding exemption to which the employee is entitled spread over the wage payments for the entire calendar year. Moreover, it is considered undesirable to burden the employer with the necessity of keeping records in order to determine at a given time the aggregate amount of the withholding exemption previously allowed to the employee.

Under the Senate bill, as in the House bill, the maximum amount allowable as a withholding exemption to an employee with respect to the wages paid by any one employer during the calendar year should approximate the amount of the withholding exemption allowed for an annual payroll period, whether such exemption is based on the schedules provided in subsection (b) of section 1622 or is reflected in the tables contained in subsection (c). For these reasons, it is expected that the Commissioner will provide reasonable regulations for the appropriate treatment of all such supplementary or overlapping wage payments. Such regulations should insure, on the one hand, that the amount of tax withheld by the employer will approximate the amount that would be withheld and collected if all wages paid to the employee by such employer were paid at periodic intervals throughout the calendar year and, on the other hand, that the employee will receive the benefit of withholding exemptions approximating in the aggregate the amounts specified under the schedules for an annual pay-roll period.

Withholding on Basis of Average Wages

The Senate bill added a new provision, which is contained in subsection (j), to permit withholding to be based on average wages. Under this provision, the Commissioner may, under regulations, authorize employers to estimate the wages which will be paid to any employee in any quarter of a calendar year; determine the amount to be withheld and collected upon each payment of wages to such employee during such quarter as if the appropriate average of the wages so estimated constituted the actual wages paid; and to withhold and collect upon any payment of wages to such employee during such quarter such amount as may be necessary to adjust the amount actually withheld and collected upon the wages of such employee during such quarter to the amount otherwise required to be withheld during such quarter. This provision is designed to promote the efficient functioning of the withholding system in cases where there is steady employment and little fluctuation in wages between pay periods, so that a reasonably accurate average can be estimated, and it is expected that the Commissioner's regulations will prescribe rules appropriate to that end.

Liability for Tax

Section 467 of the code consists of subsections (a), (b), and (c). The House bill changed the headings and combined subsections (a) and (b) into new subsection (a). These were clerical amendments made because of the new definition of the term "employer" contained in section 465 (d) under the House bill and effected no substantive change in the law Subsection 465 (b) under the House bill, relating to adjustments, was identical with section 467 (c) of the code. Under the Senate bill the corresponding section (sec. 1623) omits the provision for adjustments, since the adjustment authorization provision of section 1401 (c) of the code is made applicable.

Returns

The House bill provides for quarterly returns by the employer of tax withheld at source. The Senate bill omits the House provisions with respect to return and payment of the tax by employers. These requirements, under the Senate bill, are governed by the applicable provisions which apply to the tax imposed by section 1400. The provisions of the House bill relating to the determination of deficiencies have also been omitted in the Senate bill.

The change in the Senate bill from a system of collection, payment, and administration based upon the principles applicable to the income tax to a system of collection, payment, and administration based upon the principles underlying the collection of the social-security tax on wages has been made in order to promote efficiency and flexibility in the administration of the tax by the Government and the operations of the employer thereunder. This change, however, does not contemplate any departure from the basic principle that the responsibility and legal duty for withholding and paying the tax, etc., rests with the employer. In view of this basic principle, the Senate bill, in section 1624, retains the provision of the House bill that if the United States, a State, Territory, or political subdivision, or the District of Columbia, or any agency or instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing is the employer, the return of the tax may be made by the officer or employee having control of the payment of wages or other officer or employee appropriately designated for that purpose.

Receipts

Section 469 of the code, relating to receipts, was amended by the House bill in two respects. Subsection (a) of section 469 was amended to eliminate the language which requires the employer to show on the receipt the period of employment covered by such receipt. As so amended, the section would specifically require only that the receipts show the amount of wages paid and the amount of tax withheld with respect thereto. The Commissioner is granted authority to prescribe by regulations the form and content of such receipts and, if he finds it necessary, he may require that the periods of employment be shown. Subsection (b) of section 469 of the House bill provided that the receipts should be in lieu of the information returns with respect to wages, but information returns would still be required with respect to remuneration not subject to withholding. Under the Senate bill, these House provisions are retained as section 1625 (a) and (b), and a clerical amendment is made in the heading and in the reference to "subchapter" rather than "part." The Senate bill contemplates that a duplicate of each receipt shall be furnished to the Government and provides that the furnishing of such duplicates shall be in lieu of the filing of Form 1099 information returns.

Subsection (c) of section 1625 under the Senate bill alters the provisions relating to extension of time for the furnishing of receipts to employees. By the terms of the amendment the Commissioner under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary is empowered to grant to any employer a reasonable extension of time (not in excess of 30 days) with respect to the receipts required to be furnished to employees. Thus, the extension privilege will no longer be limited to the receipt to be furnished on the day on which the last payment of wages is made but may be applied in the case of receipts to be furnished at the close of the calendar year.

Penalties

Under the House bill subsections (a) and (b) of section 470, relating to penalties for fraudulent receipts or failure to furnish receipts, are identical with existing law. Under the Senate bill these penalty provisions remain substantially the same. The section has been renumbered as section 1626 and certain other clerical amendments have been made to adjust the provisions to the section of chapter 9 of the code.

Under the House bill subsection (c) of section 470 was amended to increase from $5 to $10 the minimum addition to the tax for failure by the employer to make and file a return required by this subchapter within the time prescribed by law or prescribed by the Commissioner in pursuance of law. The Senate bill retains this provision as section 1626 (c) with clerical changes required by the shift to chapter 9 of the code.

Section 470 (d) was a new provision added to the code by the House bill. This section provides appropriate penalties applicable to employees who willfully supply false or fraudulent withholding exemption certificates or who willfully fail to supply information which would decrease the withholding exemption. The penalty in each instance is a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year, or both, and such penalties are in lieu of those provided in section 145 (a) of the code. This provision with minor modifications is retained in the Senate bill as section 1626 (d). As amended the statutory language makes clear that the penalties are applicable in the case of an employee who willfully supplies false and fraudulent information, or who willfully fails to supply information, which would require an increase in the tax to be withheld at source on his wages. Reference to section 145 (a) was eliminated because of the change from chapter 1 to chapter 9 of the code.

Under the bill as passed by the Senate, as has been previously noted, the withholding provisions have been shifted to chapter 9 of the code. To reflect this technical alteration an additional section has been added to the withholding provisions, namely, section 1627, and a subchapter E, to follow subchapter D of chapter 9, has been added. These new provisions are discussed below.

Other Laws Applicable

Section 1627 under the Senate bill provides that all provisions of law, including penalties, applicable with respect to the social-security tax on employees imposed by section 1400 shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of new subchapter D of chapter 9, be applicable with respect to the tax imposed under that subchapter.

Verification of Returns

Subchapter E of chapter 9 under the Senate bill contains certain provisions which will apply to chapter 9 generally. Under that bill there are two sections in subchapter E, namely, section 1630 and section 1631.

General provisions with respect to verification of returns, and related matters, are contained in section 1630. The Commissioner is empowered under subsection (a) to require that any return, statement, or other document required to be filed under chapter 9 shall contain or be verified by a written declaration that such return, statement, or other document is made under the penalties of perjury. To exercise this power the Commissioner is to prescribe appropriate regulations with the approval of the Secretary. The subsection makes clear that the declaration made under the penalties of perjury shall be in lieu of any oath otherwise required. Thus, the regulations may provide that the oath may be dispensed with in the case of employers making returns under chapter 9.

Subsection (b) of section 1630 provides for penalties in the case of a person who willfully makes and subscribes any return, statement, or other document, which contains or is verified by a written declaration that it is made under the penalties of perjury, and which he does not believe to be true and correct as to every material matter. The subsection states that such person shall be guilty of a felony, and, upon conviction, shall be subject to the penalties prescribed for perjury in section 125 of the Criminal Code.

Special Provision for Payment of Withheld Taxes

Section 1631 relates to the use of incorporated banks or trust companies (which are depositaries or financial agents of the United States) in connection with the payment of taxes under chapter 9. Under this section the Secretary may authorize such incorporated banks and trust companies to receive any taxes under chapter 9 in such manner, at such times, and under such conditions as he may prescribe. If the Secretary should make such authorization, he shall prescribe the manner, times, and conditions under which the receipt of chapter 9 taxes by authorized incorporated banks and trust companies is to be treated as payment of such taxes by the collectors. Withholding under the new system will involve very considerable amounts of tax moneys which will be withheld from the wages of employees. These funds will not belong to the employers. It may well prove desirable to provide a method by which these funds will be turned over by employers, and reach their way into the Treasury, more rapidly and more currently than, for example, on a quarterly basis. The purpose of section 1631 is to provide a flexible method by which this objective may be accomplished without placing an undue strain on the administrative tax collection machinery.

Technical Amendments

Section 2 (b) of the House bill was a technical amendment changing the heading of subchapter D of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code. This amendment is unnecessary under the new structure provided in the Senate bill; accordingly, section 2 (b) of the Senate bill contains other technical amendments in keeping with the rearrangement effected thereunder. Paragraph (1) amends section 34 of the code by omitting reference to section 466 (e), relating to credit for Victory tax withheld at source under the system in effect prior to July 1, 1943. Paragraph (2) amends section 322 (f) of the code, which is likewise a cross-reference provision, to provide a cross-reference to section 1622 (f), relating to refunds or credits to employers and to recipients of income, instead of to section 466 (f), the present credit provision relating to the Victory tax.

Section 476 of the code provides that the taxes imposed by subchapter D of chapter 1 shall not apply to any taxable year commencing after the date of cessation of hostilities in the present war. Section 2 (c) of the House bill amends section 476 to limit the application of this provision to the Victory tax imposed by part I of subchapter D of chapter 1. Section 2 (c) of the Senate bill amends section 476 so that the tax imposed by part II of subchapter D of chapter 1 shall not apply with respect to any wages paid after June 30, 1943. Wages (as defined in sec. 1621 (a)) paid after that date will be subject to the provisions of subchapter D of chapter 9.

Effective Date

Section 2 (d) of the Senate bill, relating to the effective date, provides that the amendments made by section 2 (a) and (b) shall take effect on July 1, 1943, and shall be applicable to all wages paid on or after such date.

Conference Amendment

The conference amendment retains with the following changes the provisions of the Senate bill with respect to collection of income tax at source on wages:

In section 1621 (b) the word "daily" has been inserted in the definition of a miscellaneous pay-roll period. This is a clerical change.

In section 1622 (b) (2) and section 1622 (c) (2) the parenthetical expression "(including Sundays and holidays)" has been inserted in the interest of clarity.

Paragraph (5) of section 1621 (c) provides that in determining the amount to be deducted and withheld under the table method the wages may, at the election of the employer, be computed to the nearest dollar. This provision has been changed to qualify the rule so as to make it clear that it is applicable only if the wages exceed the highest wage bracket in the applicable table. Thus the rule is applicable in the case of a weekly pay-roll period where the weekly wage exceeds $200.

The provisions of section 1622 (h) have been amended in order to provide more logical rules for the effective date of withholding exemption certificates. The first rule, contained in paragraph (1), has been limited to certificates furnished after the date of commencement of employment with the employer by reason of a change of status. The second rule, contained in paragraph (2), has been extended to include the case of any certificate furnished otherwise than by reason of a change of status.

Section 1622 (h) has also been amended by adding the expression "and having no dependents." The purpose of this change is to avoid any misapprehension as to the consequences in a case where no withholding certificate is in effect.

A new paragraph (4) has been added to section 1621 (i). This paragraph authorizes the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, to prescribe regulations for determining the manner of withholding and the amount to be deducted and withheld, in the case of a payment of wages by an employer to an employee through an agent, fiduciary, or other person who also has the control, receipt, custody, or disposal of, or pays, the wages payable by another employer to such employee. In such a case the withholding exemption of the employee for any 1 year is to approximate the withholding exemption allowable with respect to an annual pay roll period. To illustrate the application of this provision: Five companies maintain a central agency which carries on the administrative work of the companies. This central agency or organization consists of a staff of stenographers, clerks, bookkeepers, and so forth. The expenses of the central agency, including wages paid to the foregoing employees, are borne by the companies in certain agreed proportions. Under the arrangement, each company is the employer of each employee on the staff of the central agency. Under the provisions of new paragraph (4), the Commissioner is authorized to provide that each such employee will be entitled in any one year only to an aggregate withholding exemption which shall approximate the withholding exemption allowable with respect to an annual pay roll period, rather than to five such withholding exemptions.

A complementary provision has been inserted as new section 1632. This section is made a part of subchapter E of chapter 9 of the code. Consequently its provisions are applicable with respect to all of the taxes imposed under chapter 9. This section provides that in case a fiduciary, agent, or other person has the control, receipt, custody, or disposal of, or pays, the wages of an employee or group of employees, employed by one or more employers, the Commissioner, under regulations prescribed by him with the approval of the Secretary, is authorized to designate such fiduciary, agent, or other person, to perform such acts as are required of employers under chapter 9 and as the Commissioner may specify. If such designation is made, all provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of an employer shall be applicable to such fiduciary, agent, or other person so designated, except as may be otherwise prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. However, except as so provided, the employer for whom such fiduciary, agent, or other person acts shall remain subject to the provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of employers.

Thus, in the illustration given above of the five companies maintaining a central agency to carry on their administrative work, the Commissioner may designate such central agency or organization to perform such of the acts with respect to withholding, return and payment of the tax, the furnishing of receipts, and so forth, as the Commissioner may specify. However, such a designation relieves the employer of responsibility only to the extent that the Commissioner prescribes.

The expression "an employee" contained in section 1622 (i), following paragraph (4) of that subsection has been changed to "the employee." This is a clarifying change.

Section 1625 (c), relating to extensions of time for the furnishing of receipts, has been changed by striking out the words "to employees." This is a clarifying change designed to make certain that the Commissioner's authority to grant extensions of time for the furnishing of receipts extends to the receipts required to be furnished by the employer with his return of withheld taxes.

Sections 2 (c) and (d), relating respectively to the expiration date of the withholding provisions of the Victory tax (part II, subchapter D of chapter 1 of the code) and the effective date of the withholding provisions under subchapter D, chapter 9 of the code, have been changed. The change with respect to the expiration date of withholding under the Victory tax provides that such withholding shall not apply with respect to any wages paid after June 30, 1943, unless such wages are paid during the calendar year 1943 with respect to a pay-roll period beginning on or before June 30, 1943. The change with respect to the effective date of withholding under the bill provides that such withholding shall take effect July 1, 1943, and shall be applicable to all wages paid on or after such date, except that it shall not be applicable to wages paid during 1943 with respect to a pay-roll period beginning before July 1, 1943.

DESCRIPTION OF HOUSE AND SENATE BILLS

Miscellaneous amendments

Credit for Tax Withheld at Source on Wages

Section 3 of the Senate bill amends section 35 of the code to provide that the amount of the tax withheld and collected under subchapter D of chapter 9 shall be allowed as a credit to the recipient of the income against the income (including Victory) tax imposed by chapter 1. The credit for the amount withheld during any calendar year upon the wages is to be allowed as a credit to the recipient of the income against the tax for the last taxable year beginning in such calendar year. Apart from a clarifying change this provision is substantially the same as the corresponding provision in the House bill.

Excessive Withholding

Section 4 (a) of the Senate bill, which amends section 322 (a) (2) of the code, relating to excessive withholding, is the same in substance as section 3 (a) of the House bill, which made a clarifying amendment to section 322 (a) (2).

Authority to Make Credits Against Estimated Tax

Section 4 (a) also adds a new paragraph (3) to section 322 (a). This provision authorizes the Commissioner to prescribe with the approval of the Secretary regulations providing for a credit against estimated tax for any taxable year of the amount determined by the taxpayer or the Commissioner to be an overpayment of the tax for a preceding taxable year.

Under the new procedure in the declaration and payment of the estimated tax (the first installment of which will generally be payable at the same time as the making of the return and final payment of the tax for the preceding taxable year) a class of cases will arise in which it is apparent that the tax for the preceding taxable year has been overpaid. The Commissioner should have the same authority to credit an overpayment of the tax for a preceding taxable year against the estimated tax for the current taxable year as he has under existing law with respect to the tax for the current taxable year. Permitting the taxpayer on his return or on his declaration to compute the overpayment and credit it against his estimated tax in his declaration would obviate unnecessary remittances by the taxpayer of the estimated tax and unnecessary refunds by the Commissioner. The administration of the provisions of the bill may, therefore, require some crediting procedure as to the estimated tax in addition to that now provided in section 322 (a) (1).

In the absence of administrative experience in the field, it seemed wiser, in providing such additional credit, not to require the credit to be made or permitted, but to grant authority to the Commissioner to make or permit this type of credit, together with authority by regulation to specify the terms, conditions, extent, and effect of the credit to be made or permitted to be made. Among the matters to be covered by the regulations if the authority is exercised are—

(1) Whether and to what extent and under what conditions the taxpayer shall be allowed to take the credit on his declaration; and (2) whether the effect of the credit (whether taken by the taxpayer or made by the Commissioner) is to be like the credit allowed under section 35 of the code or like the credit specified by section 322 (a) (1). If, under this provision, the Commissioner authorizes a credit against the estimated tax of the character of that prescribed in section 322 (a) (1), such credit will constitute a payment of the estimated tax both generally and for the purposes of section 59 (b); and if the determination of the overpayment proves to have been erroneous, the year for which the overpayment was determined is adjusted.

Presumption as to Date of Payment

Section 4 (b) of the Senate bill amends section 322 (e) of the code, relating to presumption as to date of payment, to include tax actually withheld and collected at the source under subchapter D of chapter 9; to insure the application of the rule to the proper taxable year; and to provide for the application of the same rule with respect to payments of estimated tax.

Delegation of Authority to Collectors to Make Refunds

Subsection (c) of section 4 of the Senate bill amends section 3770 (a) of the code, relating to authority to make refunds New paragraph (4) has been added which authorizes the Commissioner to delegate, with the approval of the Secretary, to the various collectors any authority, duty, or function which the Commissioner is required to exercise or perform with respect to the making of refunds, and the like, in respect of any individual, estate, or trust, where the amount involved does not exceed $1,000. This provision makes it possible for the Commissioner to delegate to the collectors the function of making refunds of such amounts, not in excess of $1,000, as the Commissioner may prescribe. This provision will permit the administrative authorities to handle refunds more expeditiously.

Rule Where No Tax Liability

Section 4 (d) of the Senate bill adds new subsection (c) to section 3770 of the code. Under this provision an amount paid as tax shall not be considered not to constitute an overpayment solely because there was no tax liability in respect of which that amount was paid.

The income-tax law requires the taxpayer to make a return of his tax and to pay the tax so returned. These requirements contemplate that in the discharge of these duties at the time, place, and manner prescribed, honest mistakes will occur—mistakes both as to the amount of the tax and as to the existence of any tax liability; and that such honest mistakes made incident to the bona fide orderly compliance with the actual or reasonably apparent duties of the taxpayer are to be corrected under the provisions of law governing overpayments. It is believed that existing law so provides. The language of certain court decisions (holding that certain payments, not made incident to a bona fide and orderly discharge of actual or reasonably apparent duties imposed by law, are not overpayments and accordingly that interest is not payable) has been read by some as meaning that no payment can result in an overpayment if no tax liability actually existed. It is not believed that such reading is in any way a statement of existing law. The provisions of the bill, however, emphasize the need for clarity in this regard.

Under the bill as passed by the Senate, two requirements become basic features of the income tax: (1) The declaration and payment of the estimated tax; and (2) the withholding and collection by the employer of tax from the wages of employees, and the return and payment as such of the amount by the employer to the Government. Honest mistakes incident to faithful and orderly compliance will, of course, occur, just as they have in the older procedures of the tax. The doubts expressed as to the existence of an overpayment in case it ultimately turns out that there is no tax, it is believed should be put to rest, and to this end the amendment to section 3770 of the code was inserted in the Senate bill. It is thought that the code does not contemplate that liability for inerest can be cast on the Government by merely dumping money as taxes on the collector, by disorderly remittances to him of amounts not computed in pursuance of the actual or reasonably apparent requirements of the code, or not transmitted in accordance with the procedures set up by the code, or by other abuses of tax administration. As to these, a proper application of existing law will enable the courts, in the future as generally in the past, to deny treatment as overpayments to these improper payments.

Cross Reference

Section 4 (e) of the Senate bill changes the designation of the last subsection of section 3771 to subsection "(f)." This is a cross-reference provision.

Review of Allowance of Interest

Section 4 (f) of the Senate bill corresponds to section 3 (b) of the House bill and amends section 3790 of the code relating to prohibition of administrative review of the Commissioner's decision on the merits of claims presented under the internal-revenue laws. Because of the difficulty of applying the rules provided in the House bill, the Senate bill has extended the scope of section 3790 to include interest on any credit or refund under the internal-revenue laws.

Conference Amendment

The conference amendment retains with the following changes the provisions of the Senate bill covering miscellaneous amendments:

Section 4 (a) of the Senate bill, amending section 322 (a) (2) of the code (relating to excessive withholding), has been amended to make clear that where the amount of the tax withheld at source on wages is in excess of the income (including Victory) tax imposed by chapter 1, the amount of such excess shall be considered an overpayment. This amendment does not effect any change in substance.

Section 4 (b) of the Senate bill, which amends section 322 (e) of the code (relating to presumption as to date of payment) has been amended in two respects: First, it has been changed to provide that the tax actually deducted and withheld at the source on wages shall be deemed to have been paid by the recipient of the income not earlier than the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of his applicable taxable year; second, a clerical change is made, which omits the reference to the case of a nonresident alien individual. This second change is required by reason of the conference change which makes the return date of certain nonresident alien individuals the same as the return date for citizens and residents of the United States.

Section 4 (c) of the Senate bill, which amends section 3770 (a) of the code by authorizing delegation of authority to collectors to make refunds, has been changed to make clear that the amount involved, i. e., $1,000, is to be determined without regard to interest, penalties, additions to the tax, and additional amounts. Such items are, however, within the scope of the authorized delegation.

The references throughout the foregoing portion of the bill to withholding at the source have been made uniform, so that the reference now is to "deduction and withholding." These are clerical changes, and do not effect any change in substance.

CURRENT PAYMENT OF TAX NOT WITHHELD AT SOURCE

Description of House and Senate Bills

The House bill provided for a system of current payment of individual income tax only to the extent of a so-called estimated basic tax (net Victory tax plus normal tax plus first-bracket surtax) on income not constituting wages subject to withholding at source. The system proposed under the Senate bill provides for the current collection of all individual income (including Victory) tax on income to the extent that such taxes are not paid through withholding at source.

Section (5) of the Senate bill strikes sections 58, 59, and 60 of the code, which are cross-reference provisions, and inserts in lieu thereof new sections 58, 59, and 60 to provide for the current payment of that portion of the individual's tax liability not required to be withheld at source. Withholding at source is at a rate designed to approximate the net Victory tax, the normal tax, and first-bracket surtax and applies only with respect to wages (as defined in sec. 1621). The current payment system is designed to provide for collection during the taxable year of the remaining tax liability for such year. Accordingly, it provides for the current collection of the net Victory tax on income not subject to withholding at source, for the current collection of the surtax above the first bracket on wages, and for the current collection of the normal tax and surtax on income not subject to withholding at source. The amount of the current payment is to be determined upon the basis of a declaration by the taxpayer of his estimated tax liability for the current taxable year.

Requirement of Declaration

Subsection (a) of section 58, under the Senate bill, prescribes the rules for determining what persons are required to make a declaration of estimated tax. Nonresident aliens and estates and trusts are specifically excepted from the requirement to make such declaration and from the current payment system. Under the House bill, nonresident alien individuals who are residents of a contiguous country and who enter and leave the United States at frequent intervals were not excepted from the requirement for a declaration. The Senate bill excepted all nonresident aliens from the operation of the current payment system.

The requirements as to who shall make and file a declaration are based generally upon the amount and kind of the estimated gross income for the current taxable year or the amount and kind of the actual gross income for the preceding taxable year, and the personal status of the individual as single or married at the time prescribed for the making of the declaration. Under the House bill, the amounts of gross income which determined the necessity for a declaration of estimated tax were based upon the amounts which determined the necessity for a return under section 51. Under the Senate bill, provision is made for declarations of estimated tax in certain cases by persons required to make returns of Victory tax under the provisions of section 455, even though such persons would not be required to make returns under the provisions of section 51. These amendments are designed to collect the Victory tax currently in the case of individuals who are not subject to withholding at the source and to equalize the system of current collection as between such persons and persons subject both to the Victory tax and the regular income tax.

Under the conditions set forth in section 58 (a) in the Senate bill, every individual who, at the time prescribed for the making of the declaration, is single or is married but not living with husband or wife shall make and file a declaration of his estimated tax for the taxable year if—

(1) His gross income from wages (as defined in sec. 1621) can reasonably be expected to exceed $2,700 for the taxable year; or

(2) His gross income from wages (as defined in sec. 1621) did exceed $2,700 for the preceding taxable year; or

(3) It can reasonably be expected that for the taxable year his gross income from sources other than wages (as defined in sec. 1621) will exceed $100 and his gross income from all sources will amount to $500 or more; or

(4) His gross income for the preceding taxable year from sources other than wages (as defined in sec. 1621) did exceed $100 and his gross income from all sources for the preceding taxable year was $500 or more.

Every individual who, at the time prescribed for the making of the declaration, is married and living with husband or wife shall make a declaration of his estimated tax for the taxable year if—

(1) It can reasonably be expected that for the taxable year, such individual will receive gross income from wages (as defined in sec. 1621) and the aggregate gross income of such individual and such spouse from wages will exceed $3,500; or

(2) In the preceding taxable year, such individual received gross income from wages (as defined in sec. 1621) and the aggregate gross income of such individual and such spouse from wages exceeding $3,500; or

(3) It can reasonably be expected that for the taxable year such individual will receive gross income from sources other than wages (as defined in sec. 1621), the aggregate gross income of such individual and such spouse from the sources other than wages will exceed $100, and (a) the gross income from all sources of such individual will exceed $624 or (b) the aggregate gross income of such individual and such spouse from all sources will amount to $1,200; or

(4) In the preceding taxable year such individual received gross income from sources other than wages (as defined in sec. 1621), the aggregate gross income of such individual and such spouse from sources other than wages exceeded $100, and (a) the gross income from such sources of such individual for the preceding taxable year exceeded $624, or (b) the aggregate gross income from all sources of such individual and such spouse for the preceding taxable year was $1,200 or more.

For the purposes of section 58, the amount of the gross income which the taxpayer can reasonably be expected to receive or, in the case of a taxpayer upon the accrual basis, the amount which can reasonably be expected to accrue, shall be determined upon the basis of the facts and circumstances existing as of the time prescribed for the making of the declaration.

Contents of Declaration

Subsection (b) of section 58 in the Senate bill prescribes the rules relative to the form and content of the taxpayer's declaration of estimated tax. Is is required generally that the declaration shall be in such form and contain such information as may be prescribed by the Commissioner under regulations approved by the Secretary. Subsection (b) specifically requires that the declaration shall state (1) the amount which the taxpayer estimates as the amount of his tax under sections 11 and 12, or section 400, as the case may be, and the Victory tax imposed by section 450 (adjusted for the credit provided in sec. 453), without regard to any credits for tax withheld at source; (2) the amount which he estimates as the amount of the credits allowable for the taxable year under sections 32, 35, and 466 (e) on account of tax withheld at source on tax-free covenant bonds and wages; and (3) the excess of the amount estimated under (1) over the amount estimated under (2). Under subsection (b) the "estimated tax for the taxable year" is the excess of the amount estimated by the taxpayer as the tax imposed by chapter 1 (without regard to the credit for taxes withheld at source) over the amount which the taxpayer estimates as the amount allowable as a credit for the taxable year for taxes withheld at the source. The subsection further provides that every declaration of estimated tax for the taxable year shall contain or be verified by a written statement that it is made under the penalties of perjury.

Joint Declaration by Husband and Wife

Under the provisions of subsection (c) of section 58 in the Senate bill, a husband and wife living together at the time prescribed for making a declaration may elect to make a joint declaration in which case the liability with respect to the estimated tax shall be joint and several. A joint declaration by husband and wife shall be signed and verified by both spouses. If the declaration is signed by one spouse as agent for the other, authorization for such action must accompany the declaration. No joint declaration is permitted if either husband or wife is a nonresident alien. If the husband and wife make a joint declaration but do not make a joint return for the taxable year the amounts paid on account of the estimated tax for such year may be treated as payments on account of the tax liability of either the husband or wife for the taxable year or may be divided between them in any manner they see fit.

Time and Place for Filing Declarations

The time and place for filing declarations of estimated tax required under section 58 under the Senate bill are prescribed in subsection (d) of such section. Such declarations must be filed on or before the 15th day of the third month of the taxable year by every person whose then anticipated income for the current taxable year or whose actual income for the preceding taxable year meets the requirements of subsection (a). In the more usual case of taxpayers on the calendar year basis, such declarations are to be filed on or before the 15th day of March. In the case of taxpayers on a fiscal year basis, such date will be the 15th day of the third month of the particular fiscal year. If, under the provisions of subsection (a) a declaration is not required on or before the 15th day of the third month of the taxable year but subsequent thereto the facts and circumstances are such that the gross income for the taxable year can reasonably be expected to meet the requirements of such subsection, a declaration of the estimated tax liability is required to be filed. In such event, the declaration must be filed on or before the 15th day of the last month of the quarter of the taxable year in which the requirements of subsection (a) are first met. For instance, a single person was hired on January 2, 1944, at a salary of $2,400 per annum. He had no other source of income, could not reasonably expect to receive any other income, and did not receive any income during the preceding taxable year. In the absence of any change of circumstances before March 15, 1944, such person is not required to make a declaration as of that date. On July 1 such person was advised that he was promoted to a higher position and that thereafter his salary would be increased to $3,200 per year. Hence, on that date the gross income of such person for the taxable year could reasonably be expected to exceed $2,700. Therefore, assuming that such taxpayer makes his income tax return on a calendar year basis, a declaration of his estimated tax liability for the taxable year should be filed on or before the 15th day of September of such year.

Under the provisions of subsection (d), an amended or revised declaration is permitted, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. Such amended or revised declaration may be filed in any quarter of the taxable year subsequent to the quarter in which the declaration or the last amended declaration was filed. The revised estimate shown in such amended declaration shall not take effect with respect to any quarter unless filed on or before the 15th day of the third month of such quarter. Declarations of estimated tax liability and all amended or revised declarations shall be filed with the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located the legal residence or principal place of business of the person making such declaration or if the declarant has no legal residence or principal place of business in the United States, such declarations and amendments and revisions shall be filed with the collector of internal revenue at Baltimore, Md. Any such amended declaration shall be filed with the collector for the district in which the original declaration was filed.

Subsection (e) of section 58 authorizes the Commissioner to grant a reasonable extension of time for filing the declaration of the estimated tax under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe with the approval of the Secretary. Except in the case of taxpayers who are abroad, no extension shall be granted for a period of more than 6 months. This provision is the same in substance as the comparable provision of the House bill, except that the Senate bill applies the same rules relative to extension to payment of the estimated tax.

Rules Applicable to Declarations

Subsection (f) relating to persons under disability, provides that if the taxpayer is unable to make his own declaration a declaration shall be made by a duly authorized agent or by the guardian or other person charged with the care of the person or property of such taxpayer. In such case, the taxpayer and his agent shall be responsible for the declaration as made and incur liability for any penalties provided for erroneous, false, or fraudulent declaration.

Under subsection (g) it is provided that the fact that an individual's name is signed to a filed declaration shall be prima facie evidence for all purposes that the declaration was actually signed by him.

Subsection (h) makes applicable to declarations of estimated tax the provisions of section 55, relating to publicity of returns.

With the exception of the foregoing section 58 (h) and the differences due to the basic difference in the systems of current payment of tax in the House bill and in the Senate bill, section 58 of the Senate bill is substantially the same as the corresponding section 58 of the House bill.

Payment of Estimated Tax

Section 59 of the Senate bill is substantially the same as section 59 of the House bill except for technical amendments necessitated by the requirement for current payment of the entire tax instead of only the basic tax as under the House bill, and a clarifying amendment relating to installment payments of the estimated tax.

Under the provisions of new section 59, if the declaration of the estimated tax is made on or before the fifteenth day of the third month of the taxable year, such tax shall be paid in four equal installments. In such case the first installment shall be paid at the time of filing the declaration, the second installment on the fifteenth day of the sixth month, the third installment on the fifteenth day of the ninth month, and the fourth installment on the fifteenth day of the twelfth month of the taxable year.

If the declaration of estimated tax is filed after the fifteenth day of the third month of the taxable year, the estimated tax shall be paid in equal installments the number of which is equal to the number of quarters remaining in the taxable year. For example, if the declaration is filed on the fifteenth day of the sixth month of the taxable year, the estimated tax shall be paid in three equal installments.

If, pursuant to section 58 (e), the Commissioner grants an extension of time within which to make a declaration of estimated tax, installments of such tax shall be paid at such time and under such conditions as the Commissioner may prescribe.

If a taxpayer files an amended or revised declaration of estimated tax, the remaining installments of estimated tax shall be ratably increased or decreased, as the case may be, to reflect any change made in the previously estimated tax by such amendment or revision. For example, on March 15, 1944, the taxpayer filed a declaration of estimated tax for the calendar year 1944 in the amount of $600. An installment of $150 was paid at the time of making such declaration. However, on June 15, 1944, the taxpayer filed an amended declaration, disclosing an estimated tax for the taxable year of $300 instead of the $600 originally estimated. As a result of such amended declaration, the installments of estimated tax required to be paid on June 15, September 15, and December 15 will each be $50.

At the election of the taxpayer, any installment of estimated tax may be paid prior to the date prescribed for its payment.

As stated above, section 58 (e) authorizes the Commissioner, under certain conditions, to grant an extension of time for payment of the estimated tax.

The section further provides that payment of the estimated tax shall be considered payment on account of the income (including Victory) tax imposed by chapter 1 for the taxable year. The taxpayer will, of course, have to file his regular income-tax return as usual, and on such return the estimated tax paid will be taken into account. All such payments of estimated tax are for the purpose of the provisions of law relating to refund or credit of the tax imposed by chapter 1, including the provisions relating to interest on overpayments of such tax, deemed to have been paid on the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of the taxable year.

Subsection (b) of section 59 provides that the estimated tax shall be assessed only to the extent paid. Thus, the collector may not distrain for any unpaid installment of estimated tax. Such provision, however, shall not be construed to prevent the application of section 146 relating to the closing by the Commissioner of the taxable year.

Special Rules for the Application of Sections 58 and 59

New section 60 under the Senate bill provides special rules for the application of sections 58 and 59 relating to the declaration and payment of the estimated tax. Subsection (a) allows the individual whose estimated gross income from farming for the taxable year is at least 80 percent of his total estimated gross income from all sources for the taxable year the option of filing his declaration on or before the fifteenth day of the last month of the taxable year, in lieu of the time prescribed for other individuals under section 58 (d). This provision recognizes the difficulty of estimating in the early part of the taxable year the amount of income which will be derived from ordinary farm operations. Weather conditions, plant and animal diseases, ravages of insects and other pests, are among the factors which contribute to the uncertainty of such income. The estimated gross income from farming is the estimated income of the farm entrepreneur from the cultivation of the soil and the raising or harvesting of any agricultural or horticultural commodities, and the raising of livestock, bees, or poultry. In other words, the requisite gross income must be derived from the operations of a stock, dairy, poultry, fruit, or truck farm, or plantation, ranch, nursery, range, or orchard.

Subsection (b) of new section 60 authorizes the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, to prescribe suitable regulations for the application with respect to short taxable years of section 58, 59, and 294 (a) (3), (4), (5), added to the Internal Revenue Code by the bill. Thus, the rules applicable to short taxable years with respect to the declaration and payment of the estimated tax, and additions to the tax for failure to make a timely declaration of estimated tax, timely payment of installments of estimated tax, or for substantial underestimates of tax, are to be established by regulations.

Subsection (c) prescribes the special rule governing the transition to the system of current payment of the income tax on income not subject to withholding at source. The subsection provides the rule applicable with respect to the filing of the first declaration required under the bill. In the case of a taxable year which is the calendar year 1943, the declaration is to be filed on or before September 15, 1943. In the case of a taxable year which is a fiscal year beginning after January 1, 1943, the declaration shall be filed on such date as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe. Apart from the date for filing the first declaration, all of the other rules prescribed in the bill with respect to declarations generally shall be applicable to such first declaration. The subsection makes it clear that the payments which taxpayers are required to make with respect to their 1942 tax shall be applied to decrease ratably the installments of estimated tax for taxable years beginning in 1943.

Additions to Tax

Section (5) (b) of the Senate bill adds to section 294 (a) of the code three new paragraphs numbered (3), (4), and (5). These paragraphs contain sanctions relating to the filing of declarations and payment of installments of estimated tax and to the proper estimate of tax.

Paragraph (3) provides for an addition to the tax in the case of failure to make and file a declaration of estimated tax within the time specifically prescribed by this bill or within the time prescribed by the Commissioner under the authority granted by the bill. Such addition to the tax shall be in an amount equal to 10 percent of the tax. The term "the tax" for the purpose of this provision means the tax imposed by chapter 1 of the code. The Senate bill eliminates from the comparable provision of the House bill the minimum penalty of $10.

Paragraph (4) provides for an addition to the tax imposed by chapter 1 of the code in the case of the failure to pay an installment of the estimated tax within the time specifically prescribed in the bill or within the time prescribed by the Commissioner pursuant to authority granted by the bill. Such addition to the tax shall be in the amount of 2½ percent of the tax imposed by chapter 1, but in no event shall such addition be less than $2.50. In the case of husband and wife who file a joint declaration of estimated tax for the taxable year, and subsequently file separate returns for such year, the addition to the tax in the case of a failure to pay an installment of the estimated tax within the time prescribed shall be 2½ percent of the tax imposed on each spouse under chapter 1, but not less than $2.50 in the case of each spouse.

Paragraph (5) provides for an addition to the tax in the case of a substantial underestimate of tax. In view of the fact that the taxpayer may revise his estimate of tax quarterly throughout the taxable year, and as late as the 15th day of the last month of the taxable year, the provision for an addition to the tax is a reasonable sanction to insure the payment during the taxable year of a total amount of estimated tax closely approximating the actual liability for the year. In the case of individuals other than farmers exercising the election under section 60 (a), an addition to the tax imposed by chapter 1 is provided in the event that the amount of the estimated tax (increased by the amounts of the credits for taxes withheld at source) is less than 80 percent of the amount of the tax imposed by that chapter (determined without regard to the credits for taxes withheld at source). The parenthetical expressions represent a change from the comparable provision of the House bill, designed to obviate hardship in certain cases. In the event of a failure to file any declaration where one is due, the amount of the estimated tax for the purposes of this provision will be zero. In the case of farmers exercising the election under section 60 (a), the addition to the tax is applicable if the amount of the estimated tax, increased as stated above, is less than 66⅔ percent of the amount of the tax imposed by chapter 1, determined as stated above. The addition to the tax shall be an amount equal to 6 percent of the difference between the amount of the estimated tax so increased, and the tax imposed by chapter 1 so determined; or the difference in dollars, whichever is the lesser. To illustrate: (1) Taxpayer A files a declaration showing an estimated tax of $200, based upon the excess of an amount estimated as the amount of tax without regard to withholding credit, $800, over the amount which he estimates as the withholding credit for tax withheld at source on wages, $600. His tax for the year, determined without regard to the withholding credits, is $1,200. The actual amount of tax withheld on his wages is $700. Eighty percent of his tax for the year determined without regard to the withholding credits is $960. The amount of the estimated tax, which is $200 ($800 minus $600), increased by the amount of the credit for tax withheld at source ($700), is $900. Accordingly, taxpayer A is subject to the penalty. Applying the 6-percent rate, the amount of the penalty is $18 (6 percent of $1,200 minus $900). The penalty of the dollar amount of the excess is not applicable because that excess is $300 ($1,200 minus $900). The 6-percent penalty is the lesser, and therefore applicable.

(2) Taxpayer B files a declaration showing an estimated tax of $200, based upon the excess of an amount estimated as the amount of tax without regard to withholding credit, $800, over the amount which he estimates as the withholding credit for tax withheld at source of wages, $600. His tax for the year, determined without regard to the withholding credits, is $950. The actual amount of tax withheld on his wages is $550. The amount of the estimated tax, which is $200 ($800 minus $600), increased by the amount of the credit for tax withheld at source ($550) is $750. Accordingly, since 80 percent of $950 is $760, taxpayer B is subject to the penalty. Applying the 6-percent rate, the amount of the penalty is $12 (6 percent of $950 minus $750). The penalty of the dollar amount of the excess is $10 ($760 minus $750). Since the dollar amount penalty is less than the penalty at the 6-percent rate, the former is applicable.

Penalties

Subsection (c) of section (5) of the Senate bill amends section 145 (a) of the code. Section 145 (a) prescribes criminal penalties for the willful failure to make and file returns, keep records, supply information, or pay tax. By the amendment contained in section 5 (c) the same penalties are made applicable to the failure to make and file declarations and pay the estimated tax.

Installments

Section (5) (d) of the Senate bill terminates the privilege of installment payments of tax in the case of all individuals subject to the system of current collection of income taxes provided in the bill. The bill contemplates that since the payments made during the taxable year will be based upon the reasonably anticipated tax liability for that year (which should closely approximate the actual tax liability in view of the privilege granted to the taxpayer to revise his estimate), there is no occasion for retaining the installment privilege. The requirement, pursuant to section 56 (a), for payment on the 15th day of the third month following the close of the taxable year of any excess of the actual liability over the amount of estimated tax paid during the taxable year should not create a hardship in any case where a reasonable and proper estimate is made during the taxable year. Despite the amendment made by subsection (d), any payment of tax or any payment of an installment of tax due and payable before September 1, 1943, shall be made in accordance with the requirements of the present law. In other words, a taxpayer on the calendar year basis, who pays his 1942 tax liability in installments, must pay his March 15 and June 15, 1943, installments of 1942 tax.

Effective Date

Subsection (e) of section 5 of the Senate bill provides that the amendments made by section 5 of the bill shall be effective with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1942. Thus the recommended system for current payment of individual income tax not withheld at source applies only to taxable years beginning on or after January 1, 1943.

Conference Amendment

The conference amendment extended the system of current payment of tax not withheld at source to those nonresident aliens with respect to whose wages withholding at source is made applicable. Thus, generally speaking, the current tax payment system will apply to certain nonresident alien individuals who are residents of a contiguous country and who enter and leave the United States at frequent intervals. Such aliens, with respect to wages received for services performed in this country, are subject to tax in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States. Since they will be subject to withholding on such wages, failure to include them within the current tax payment system would cause a considerable doubling-up in the payment of their taxes. The necessary change to effect the inclusion of these aliens is contained in the opening sentence of section 58 (a). For the purposes of the contents of the declaration, such aliens shall estimate the amounts of all of the credits allowable with respect to taxes withheld under section 143 and withheld on wages.

Paragraph (3) of section 58 (a) under the conference amendment is a new provision which extends the scope of the declaration requirement in order to cover a situation arising from the operation of section 6 (b). Under this provision a declaration of estimated tax for the taxable year beginning in 1943 is required from an individual who was required to make a return for the taxable year beginning in 1942, and whose gross income from wages for such 1942 taxable year exceeds the gross income which can reasonably be expected to be received from wages for the 1943 taxable year. This provision is designed to require an individual to file a declaration and pay as a part of estimated tax the amount of the excess of his 1942 tax liability over his 1943 tax liability (by reason of section 6 (b) (1)), in the case where such individual would otherwise not be required to file a declaration for the taxable year 1943.

Section 58 (b) (1) has been changed by striking the reference in the Senate bill to "the amount of tax under sections 11 and 12, or 400, as the case may be, and section 450," and inserting in lieu thereof: "The amount of tax under this chapter." This is a clarifying amendment.

Section 5 (d), which amends section 56 (b) of the code, has been changed to remove the installment privilege in the case of the nonresident alien individuals to whom withholding under subchapter D of chapter 9 is made applicable. This provision is required by reason of the inclusion of such individuals in the current tax-payment system.

A new subsection (e) has been added to section 5 of the bill. This subsection amends sections 217 (a) and 218 (a) of the code to provide, in effect, that nonresident alien individuals to whom withholding under subchapter D of chapter 9 is made applicable shall file returns and pay tax at the time provided in the case of citizens and residents of the United States. The purpose of this provision is to coordinate the return and payment date of such individuals with the date applicable to others to whom the current tax payment system applies.

Subsection (f) of the conference amendment (corresponding to subsection (e) of the Senate bill) contains a change which precludes the application of section 294 (a) (5) in the case of taxpayers who are not required to make a declaration of estimated tax for a taxable year beginning in 1943.

Relief from double payments in 1943

Description of House and Senate Bills

Section 6 of the Senate bill contains provisions relating to the problem of transition to the system of current collection of tax liabilities. This section differs materially from the corresponding section of the House bill. This difference is occasioned by the fact that under the House bill the system of current collection of tax liabilities is applied only to normal tax, surtax at the first bracket rate and the net Victory tax, the balance of tax liability for any taxable year being collected in the year following the receipt of the income as under existing law. Under the House bill the transition problem was met by the discharge of the liability for tax for the taxable year beginning in 1942 only to the extent of the normal tax plus a percentage of the surtax net income at the first bracket rate. Thus, the amount discharged corresponded approximately to the amount to be collected currently in cases in which the income for the 2 years is approximately the same.

The Senate bill calls for the collection currently of the entire tax liability. Section 6 of the Senate bill meets the problem of transition by discharging the entire liability for the taxable year commencing in 1942. Under subsection (a) of section 6 this discharge is made applicable as of September 1, 1943, to all persons to whom the system of current collection of tax liabilities applies, with the exception of any case in which the taxpayer is convicted of any criminal offense with respect to the tax for the taxable year 1942 or in which additions to the tax for such taxable year are applicable by reasons of fraud. It is also provided that interest and additions to the tax for the taxable year 1942 shall be collected as a part of the tax for the taxable year 1943.

In order, however, to prevent certain windfalls as a result of the discharge, subsections (b) and (c) of section 6 of the Senate bill provide for an increase of the 1943 tax liability in certain situations. The net effect of these increases, which is more fully explained below, is to reduce the amount of the relief from 1942 tax liability, but for administrative reasons the entire 1942 tax liability is discharged and the reduction is couched in terms of an increase in the 1943 liability which would otherwise be due. There are no comparable provisions in the House bill.

Subsection (b) of section 6 of the Senate bill provides a special rule applicable in cases in which the 1942 tax would have been greater than the 1943 tax. In such a case an amount equal to the excess of the 1942 tax over the 1943 tax (in both instances determined without regard to interest, additions to the tax, and credits for amounts withheld at source) is added to the 1943 tax liability. For example, a taxpayer who is married but has no dependents and who had a net income for the taxable year 1942 of $10,000 and would, therefore, be liable for a tax in the amount of $2,152 for the year 1942 but for the provisions of subsection (a) of section 6, is nevertheless liable for that minimum amount of tax for the year 1943, even though his net income for 1943 were to drop to a figure which would produce a tax liability less than $2,152. If, for example, his net income for the year 1943 were only $2,000, producing a tax liability of approximately $180, he would have added to his liability for 1943 the difference between $2,152 and $180, or $1,972. A special exception to this rule makes such an increase of the 1943 tax liability inapplicable with respect to persons entering upon active service with the armed forces in 1942 or 1943, to the extent that the excess of the 1942 tax over the 1943 tax is attributable to earned net income as defined in section 25 (a) (4) of the Internal Revenue Code. The determination of the portion of the excess of 1942 tax over 1943 tax which is attributable to earned net income is to be determined under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

The increase in the tax liability for 1943 which is effected by subsection (b) of section 6 of the Senate bill is considered to be a part of the 1943 tax which is to be paid currently during the taxable year. Therefore, on the occasion of the taxpayer's filing his declaration of estimated tax for 1943 on September 15, in the case of a taxpayer on a calendar year, the tax liability for the taxable year 1943 as estimated by the taxpayer will include any increase resulting from the operation of subsection (b) of this section. Thus, in the case of a calendar year taxpayer (other than a taxpayer who entered the armed forces in 1942 or 1943) who elected to pay his 1942 tax in installments, the September and December installments of estimated tax can never be less than one-fourth of the 1942 tax less whatever amount is estimated to be withheld at source.

Subsection (c) of section 6 of the Senate bill contains two additional situations in which the 1943 tax liability is increased as a result of, in effect, reducing the amount of the 1942 tax liability discharged. In both of the situations covered under subsection (c) however, the resulting increase in the 1943 tax is considered not to be a part of the 1943 estimated tax which is to be paid currently during the taxable year. Such increase, therefore, is required to be paid at the time prescribed for the payment of the tax for the 1943 year. Subsection (d) of this section, which will be subsequently discussed, provides for a manner in which this increase may be paid over a period of 4 years. In effect, in each of the situations covered under subsection (c) the principle involved is the same, namely the reduction in the amount of relief from tax liability for 1942 or 1943, whichever year is the measure of relief, from a full year's relief to a lower amount in cases where the taxpayer's income has risen substantially when compared with the income of a previous period. This lower amount of tax relief is obtained by computing a tentative tax for the year otherwise serving as the measure for relief, based on the amount of the surtax net income of the base year plus $10,000. As in subsection (b) the tax for the year 1942 is technically discharged and the excess of tax liability over the relief so computed is added as an increase of 1943 tax. The subsection provides that the increase in tax will be determined under regulations of the Commissioner. It is contemplated that such regulations will prescribe the details relating to the comparisons of the years involved, the computations of the tentative tax on which such increase is based, the method of determining the composition of the income on which the tentative tax is computed, and other matters involved.

The first situation covered by the Senate bill in subsection (c) of section 6 is one in which the tax for the taxable year 1942 (determined without regard to interest and additions to the tax and credits for amounts withheld at source); is less than that for the taxable year 1943 (similarly determined), and where the surtax net income of the taxpayer for any one of the taxable years 1938, 1939, or 1940, whichever may be selected by him (hereafter referred to as the base year), plus $10,000 is less than the surtax net income of the taxpayer for the taxable year 1942. In such a case relief from the liability for the taxable year 1942 is limited to an amount equal to a tentative tax computed as if the portion of the surtax net income for the taxable year, which is not greater than the sum of the surtax net income for the base year plus $10,000, constituted both the surtax net income for the taxable year 1942 and the net income for such taxable year after allowance of all credits against net income. The effect of this provision is to limit the discharge of the 1942 liability to an amount of tax computed on an amount of surtax net income and net income equivalent to that of the base year plus $10,000 computed at the 1942 rate rather than on the income for 1942. The amount of income on which the tentative tax is computed is composed of the same type of income as the income of the 1942 taxable year. Thus if the 1942 income consisted entirely of capital gains the tentative tax would be computed as a tax on capital gains. The excess of the 1942 tax over the tentative tax computed in this manner is discharged and the amount of such excess is added as part of the 1943 tax liability.

An example will illustrate the application of this provision. Taxpayer A had a surtax net income of $5,000 for his base year. In 1942 he had a tax liability of $13,002. For 1943 his tax, without regard to this section, amounted to $14,000. His surtax net income for 1942 was $30,000 and was composed entirely of dividends and interest. By taking the amount of his surtax net income for his base year of $5,000 and adding to it the sum of $10,000, a tentative tax for 1942 for income thus constituted would be $4,680. Thus, the amount by which the tax for 1943 is increased is the difference between $13,002 and $4,680 or $8,322.

The second situation covered in subsection (c) is one in which the tax for the taxable year 1942 (determined without regard to interest, additions to the tax and credits for amounts withheld at source), is equal to or greater than the tax for 1943 (similarly determined) and the surtax net income of the taxpayer for the base year plus $10,000 is less than the surtax net income for the taxable year 1943. Where the tax for 1942 exceeds the tax for 1943, subsection (b) initially operates to increase the 1943 tax by the amount of the excess. In such a case the relief from liability for the taxable year 1942 is further limited by subsection (c) to an amount equal to a tentative tax computed as if the portion of the surtax net income for the 1943 taxable year which is not greater than the sum of the surtax net income for the base year plus $10,000, constituted both the surtax net income for the taxable year 1943 and the net income for such taxable year after allowance of all credits against net income. An additional factor is present when reference is had to 1943 as the year for measuring the relief owing to the fact that Victory tax is applicable to this year. It is necessary, therefore, in arriving at the tentative tax to compute a tentative Victory tax based on an amount determined by a ratio based upon relationships with respect to the types of 1943 incomes. Thus, the computation in this situation is similar to the computation made in the first situation covered, but the comparison between the surtax net income of the taxable years and the excess amount of tax over the tentative tax is based on the surtax net income of the 1943 year and the computation takes its particular form from the manner in which the income for 1943 is constituted, in this subsection it is also provided that in the event that there is included in the taxable year used as the measure of relief, income which, under section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code, is attributed to the base year selected by the taxpayer, such income shall be excluded in computing the surtax net income of the relief year and shall be included in computing the surtax net income for the base year.

Subsection (d) of section 6 of the Senate bill provides that at the election of the taxpayer made under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, the time for the payment of the portion of the tax for 1943 equal to the increase occasioned by the application of subsection (c) shall be extended. If so extended such portion of the tax shall be paid in four equal installments, the first of which shall be paid on the fifteenth day of the fifteenth month following the close of the taxable year and one of the remaining three installments shall be paid on the last day of each succeeding 12-month period. It is provided that the Commissioner may condition this extension upon the furnishing of a bond not exceeding the amount of such increase with such surety or sureties as he may deem necessary. If the time is extended for payment of this portion of the tax, it is provided further in this subsection that there shall be collected as a part of the tax, interest in the amount of 4 percent per annum on each such installment from the date prescribed for the payment of the tax for the taxable year until the date on which such installment is paid or payable, whichever is the earlier. If any installment is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable, it and the remaining installments shall be paid upon notice and demand from the collector and interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum is to be collected from the payable date until the date of payment.

Subsection (e) of the Senate bill provides special rules for the application of subsections (b) and (c) and requires that in computing the tax for the taxable year 1943, the credit for foreign tax shall be determined without regard to any increase in the 1943 tax by reason of subsections (b) and (c). It further provides that in applying sections 105, 106, and 107 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to limitations on tax) any increase in the tax occasioned by subsections (b) and (c) shall likewise be disregarded. This subsection also contains a provision for the computation of the increase in tax under either subsection (b) or (c) where a joint return is made by a taxpayer to whom either one of the subsections apply. The rule is stated that the taxes of the spouses of the taxable year for which a joint return is not made shall be aggregated for the purposes of subsections (b) and (c), and, in addition, provides that if the taxable year for which a joint return is not made is the taxable year 1943, the liability for the increase in the tax under subsections (b) and (c) shall be joint and several.

In the Senate bill subsection (f) of section 6 provides that subsection (a) shall not apply to an individual who died during the taxable year 1942. Thus, no amount of the tax liability of such a person is discharged.

Subsection (g) of section 6 of the Senate bill provides for the treatment of payments made on account of the 1942 tax. Any payment (other than interest and additions to the tax) made on account of the tax imposed by chapter I of the Internal Revenue Code for the taxable year 1942 upon a taxpayer whose liability is discharged under subsection (a) is considered as payment on account of the estimated tax for 1943. Where any payment of such tax is made pursuant to an extension of time granted by the Commissioner prior to September 1, 1943, such payment is likewise treated as a payment of estimated tax for 1943 and is required to be paid despite the fact that the provisions discharging the tax liability are effective as of September 1, 1943. If the taxpayer should become delinquent prior to September 1 in the payment of his tax or any installment, the fact that the liability for 1942 tax is discharged as of that date is specifically provided as not relieving the taxpayer of his liability for the tax. Such payment, however, is to be treated as a timely payment would be, namely, as a payment on account of estimated tax liability for 1943. The effect of this subsection is to require taxpayers who have elected to pay in installments to continue undiminished their payments on account of 1942 tax liability for all installments which would be due before September 1, 1943. In the event of an extension of time or of delinquency occurring before September, the legal consequences resulting are no different from what they would be under existing law and only after the payments for which time has been extended or which have become delinquent have been paid, do such payments take the character of payments on account of estimated tax for 1943. This subsection further contains the rule that if any payment on account of the tax for 1942 is made pursuant to a joint return, the payment may be treated as a payment on account of the estimated tax of either the husband or the wife or may be divided between them.

Subsection (h) of section 6 of the Senate bill contains the definition of the term "taxable year" when used in reference to the years 1938, 1939, 1940, 1942, or 1943 in the section. It provides that the term means the taxable year beginning in such enumerated year. When used in conjunction with 1942 or 1943 it does not mean any taxable year of less than 12 months, unless such short year is occasioned by the death of the taxpayer or unless there is no taxable year of 12 months beginning in the calendar year. Thus there will be no relief from the tax liability with respect to the short taxable year 1942 where a taxpayer effects a change from a calendar- to a fiscal-year basis but the 12-month fiscal year beginning in 1942 will be the year for which tax is discharged.

Conference Amendment

The conference amendment retains with the following changes the provisions of the Senate bill with respect to relief from double payments in 1943:

In place of the 100 percent discharge of tax liability for most taxpayers, the committee of conference adopted the policy of 75 percent discharge of such liabilities where the total liability is in excess of $50. As in the Senate bill, even though the effect be to discharge only 75 percent of the tax liability of the lower of 1942 or 1943, for administrative reasons the entire 1942 tax liability is discharged and the 1943 tax liability is increased by the 25 percent of tax with respect to which no relief is granted. Thus, in the case of taxpayers whose tax for 1942 is not greater than that for 1943, section 6 (a) of the bill, as agreed to in conference, provides that the 1942 tax shall be completely discharged but that the 1943 tax shall be increased by an amount equal to 25 percent of such tax for 1942. Where, however, the tax liability of the individual for 1942 is $50 or less, the entire amount of the tax is discharged and the 1943 liability is not increased. In order to prevent inequity to persons whose tax liability only slightly exceeds $50, it is further provided that the tax for 1943 shall be increased by 25 percent of the amount of the tax or the excess of the tax liability over $50, whichever is the lesser.

The conference amendment brings into the system of current collection of income tax, by imposing the requirement for filing declarations, etc., those nonresident aliens who are residents of contiguous countries and who enter and leave this country at frequent intervals by reason of being employed in this country. Such individuals are subject to withholding provisions applicable to citizens on their wages earned in this country (except where the withholding is specifically made inapplicable by regulations), and such individuals file returns under existing law in the same manner as citizens. In order, therefore, that these individuals should not be required to double up in their payments of tax to this country, they are included in the provisions of section 6 of the bill, discharging tax liability for the taxable year 1942. Since the fixed income from investments of such persons is withheld on at the source currently under existing law, the discharge of tax liability applicable to such persons as in the case of all other persons is measured in the terms of tax imposed under chapter 1, which means, as it does throughout the law (unless specifically stated otherwise), the net tax liability after credits against the tax.

As in the Senate bill, subsection (b) of section 6 provides that the amount of tax liability in effect discharged shall be measured by the 1943 tax liability in cases in which that liability is less than the 1942 tax liability. As in the Senate bill, in this case the 1942 tax liability is technically discharged and any excess of the 1942 over the 1943 tax liability is added to the 1943 tax liability. In such a case the additional 25 percent of tax, or excess of tax liability over $50, whichever is the lesser, which is added to the 1943 tax, is computed on the lesser amount of tax liability, namely, that for 1943. For example, under the conference amendment a person whose tax for 1942 was $1,000, and for 1943 was $800, would be liable for a 1943 tax in the amount of $1,200 ($800 plus $200 plus 25 percent of $800), and his 1942 tax would be discharged.

The comparison to determine whether the 1942 or the 1943 tax liability is the greater is made on the basis of tax liability before the application of credits against the tax for amounts withheld at source. Where the 1942 tax liability is not greater than that for 1943, the 25-percent increase is determined on the basis of the tax imposed (i. e., net tax liability after credits) for 1942. For the purposes of determining the amount of the increase in the 1943 tax liability where the 1942 tax liability is greater, the tax imposed (i. e., net tax liability after credits) for 1942 is used with respect to the year 1942 and the tax imposed plus the credits for tax withheld at source under sections 466 (e) and 35 of the code is used with respect to the year 1943. The difference in the two taxes so determined is the increase to be added. For the purpose of determining the amount of the 25-percent increase in the 1943 tax in such a case, the tax imposed for 1943 plus the credits for tax withheld at source under sections 466 (e) and 35 are used.

The conference amendment recognizes that, in the case of a nonresident alien or a person holding substantial amounts of tax free covenant bonds, there might be a situation where an individual's tax before credits for tax withheld at source for 1942 would exceed his tax for 1943 similarly determined, but the tax imposed for 1942 would be less than his tax imposed for 1943 plus credits for withheld tax on wages under sections 35 and 466 (e), so that there would be no excess of 1942 tax liability over 1943 tax liability.

In such a case the conference amendment limits the 25-percent increase in the 1943 tax to 25 percent of the net tax for 1942, or the excess of such tax over $50, whichever is the lesser. This limitation is necessary to achieve the result that the measure of discharge of tax liability shall be the tax liability of the year in which the lesser tax is imposed.

The conference amendment makes some changes in the treatment of cases of increased incomes found in subsection (c) of section 6 of both the Senate bill and the bill as agreed to in conference. The taxable year 1937 is added to the years from which the taxpayer may select his base year. In addition, it is provided that $20,000, instead of $10,000, is to be added to the surtax net income of the base year in computing the tentative tax which is the limit of discharge of tax liability. If the tentative tax so computed is less than 75 percent of the tax liability for the year which is the measure of relief, the excess of such 75 percent of tax liability over the amount of tentative tax is made an additional increase in the 1943 tax.

By reason of a technical rearrangement, special rules for the application of the provisions relating to discharge of tax liability are to be found in subsection (d) of section 6 of the bill as agreed to in conference rather than in subsection (e) of that section as in the Senate bill. These rules in addition to the points discussed hereafter relate to: (1) The application to the taxable year 1943 of the foreign tax credit (paragraph (3)); (2) the application to the taxable year 1943 of the limitations on tax rate effected by sections 105, 106, and 107 of the code (paragraph (3)); and (3) the rule to be followed in the case where joint and separate returns are made by a husband and wife for the taxable years 1942 and 1943 respectively, or vice versa (paragraph (2)).

In addition, as a further technical rearrangement, there is included in paragraph (1) of subsection (d) the rule found in subsection (b) of section 6 of the Senate bill excepting from the increase in the 1943 tax the excess of the 1942 tax over the 1943 tax to the extent attributable to earned net income in the case of persons who were members of the armed forces during 1942 or 1943. In the Senate bill this exception was applicable to a member of the military or naval forces of the United States. The conference amendment makes this exception applicable also to a member of the armed forces of any of the United Nations. Instead of the use of the phrase "attributable to earned net income" in the Senate bill, the conference amendment excepts from the increase "an amount equal to the amount by which the tax for taxable year is increased by reason of the inclusion in the net income for the taxable year 1942 of the amount of the earned net income." This change is designed to make certain that the earned net income in this respect is to be taken out of the upper tax brackets.

The conference amendment likewise incorporates, as paragraph (7) of subsection (d) of section 6, subsection (f) of section (6) of the Senate bill providing no discharge of tax liability in case of persons who died in 1942. There is also incorporated, as paragraph (4), the provision in subsection (e) of section (6) of the Senate bill relating to the treatment of section 107 income in cases to which subsection (c) is applicable.

The conference amendment adds to subsection (d) of section (6), as paragraph (5), an additional rule for the application of subsection (c). This rule provides that if during the base year of an individual, such individual was a shareholder in a corporation and if substantially all of the assets of the corporation were acquired by such individual or a partnership of which he is a member pursuant to complete liquidation of the corporation at any time prior to May 1, 1943, and if at all times after the liquidation up to and including whichever of the 2 taxable years, 1942 or 1943, is the measure of discharge of the taxpayer's liability, the trade or business of the corporation was carried on by the individual or partnership, the individual may compute his surtax net income of the base year as if the earnings and profits of the corporation for taxable year ending with or within the base year had all been distributed as dividends at the end of such taxable year. The individual's distributive share of these hypothetical dividends is limited to his proportionate share in the partnership during the taxable year used as the measure of his discharge of tax liability if such interest is proportionately less than his interest in the corporation.

Subsection (d) of section 6, in paragraph (6), provides that the 25 percent increase in 1943 tax required under subsections (a) or (b) (2), or the additional increase under subsection (c), shall not be considered to be a part of the tax for the taxable year 1943 for the purposes of the estimated tax provisions. Thus these increases would for the first time be reflected in the annual returns filed in 1944. A similar provision was incorporated in subsection (c) of section 6 of the Senate bill with respect to the subsection (c) increase.

The conference amendment incorporates in paragraph (2) of subsection (e) of section 6, the rule with respect to granting extension of time for the payment of any increase in 1943 tax resulting from the application of subsection (c). The substance of this provision is the same as that found in the Senate bill in subsection (d) of this section. Paragraph (1) of subsection (e) under the conference amendment contains provisions for the extension of time for payment of the 25 percent increase resulting from the application of subsections (a) and (b) (2). This paragraph provides that at the election of the taxpayer, the Commissioner shall extend the time for payment of the portion of the tax for the taxable year 1943 equal to one-half of the amount of the 25 percent increase under subsection (a) or (b) (2). The time for payment of this one-half is extended to the fifteenth day of the fifteenth month following the close of the taxable year. As in the case of the increase under subsection (c), the Commissioner may condition the extension upon the furnishing by the taxpayer of a bond not exceeding the amount with respect to which the extension applies, with such surety or sureties as he may deem necessary, conditioned upon the payment of the amount in accordance with the terms of the extension. If the amount is not paid on or before the date on which it is payable as a result of the extension, it is to be paid on notice and demand from the collector; and if not paid on the payable date, interest at the rate of 6 percent per annum is to be collected as a part of the tax on the amount for which the extension was granted for the period beginning with the date on which this amount is payable and ending on the date on which it is paid.

By reason of the technical rearrangement, the conference amendment includes, with minor technical changes, in subsection (f) of section 6 the substance of the provisions found in subsection (g) of section 6 of the Senate bill. This subsection relates to the treatment of payments on account of the 1942 tax.

Under the conference amendment subsection (g) incorporates the provisions of subsection (h) of section 6 of the Senate bill.

The conference amendment adds a new subsection (h) providing that the entire section 6 shall be applied in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

ADDITIONAL ALLOWANCE FOR MILITARY AND NAVAL PERSONNEL

Description of the House and Senate Bills

Section 22 (b) (13) of the code makes provision for an exclusion from gross income in the case of personnel below the grade of commissioned officer in the military and naval forces of the United States. The amount to be excluded under this provision is not to exceed $250 in the case of a single person and $300 in the case of a married person or head of a family and applies only to salary or compensation received for active service in the armed forces during the present war.

The House bill would amend section 22 (b) (13) of the code to effect an exclusion from gross income in the case of military and naval personnel, without distinction as to rank, with respect to the compensation received during any taxable year and before the termination of the present war as proclaimed by the President for active service during such war. The amount to be so excluded would not exceed the excess of $3,500 over the personal exemption claimed under section 25 (b) of the code.

The Senate bill amends section 22 (b) (13) to provide for a flat exclusion of $1,500 from gross income in the case of all military and naval personnel, without distinction as to rank, with respect to such compensation. The amount of such exclusion is not to be reduced by the personal exemption claimed under section 25 (b) of the code.

The amendment would apply only with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1942, and not, as under the House bill, with respect to all compensation received after December 31, 1941, by a member of the military or naval forces of the United States for active service in such forces.

Conference Amendment

The conference amendment adopts the provisions of the Senate bill, but extends the application of those provisions to a member of the military or naval forces of any of the other United Nations. The provision will therefore cover such individuals as well as members of the military or naval forces of the United States.

ABATEMENT OF TAX FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES UPON DEATH

Description of the House and Senate Bills

Under the House bill supplement U is added to chapter 1 of the code to relieve a member of the military or naval forces of the United States who dies on or after December 7, 1941, in active service from the liability for the tax imposed by chapter 1 for the taxable year in which falls the date of his death. In addition thereto, the supplement provides that any tax imposed under chapter 1 or under the corresponding title of any prior revenue act (including interest and additions to the tax) which is unpaid as of the date of death shall not be assessed. If any such tax, interest, or additions to the tax have been assessed and are unpaid at the date of death, such assessment or assessments shall be abated. If the amount of any such liability which was unpaid as of the date of death is collected subsequent to such date, the amount so collected shall be credited or refunded as an overpayment.

The Senate bill revised the House version of this new supplement to limit the relief granted therein to that portion of the income taxes which is attributable to earned net income as defined in section 25 (a) (4) of the code. In addition, the taxes in respect to which such relief is granted are limited, in general, to those which would have become due and payable after the date when such individual entered upon active service in such forces or the effective date of the Selective Service Act (September 16, 1940) whichever date is the later, assuming that such member paid, or would have paid, his taxes in quarterly installments to the extent provided for in the code. If the liability for the portion of such taxes which is attributable to earned net income is outstanding at the date of death, the liability shall be abated. If such portion of the taxes has been paid at any time, the amount paid shall be credited or refunded as an overpayment.

To effectuate this policy, the Senate bill classifies such deceased members of the armed forces into three groups according to the year in which they entered upon active duty in such forces, and states with respect to each group those taxes (or the portions thereof) of which the members of the group are to be relieved. This classification was made necessary by reason of the transition in the year 1943 to a current tax basis.

The first category applies to those who entered upon such service before the commencement of the taxable year beginning in 1943. The taxes to be abated, credited, or refunded to members in this group are (1) the tax attributable to earned net income for the taxable year in which falls the date on which he entered upon such service or September 16, 1940, whichever date is the later; (2) the tax attributable to earned net income for all subsequent taxable years while he was in such service; and (3) for the taxable year last preceding the date on which he entered upon such service or September 16, 1940, whichever date is the later, that portion of the tax for such preceding year attributable to earned net income which bears the same ratio to the entire tax so attributable as the number of quarters in the taxable year referred to in (1) subsequent to the date on which he entered upon such service or September 16, 1940, whichever date is the later, bears to 4. Thus, for example, if the individual (on a calendar-year basis) enters the service on July 1, 1942, he would be exempt from the tax attributable to his earned net income for the year 1942, for all subsequent years in the service and for one-half of the tax so attributable for the calendar year 1941. If he entered the service on July 1, 1940, he would be exempt from such tax for 1940 and subsequent years in service and for one-fourth of such tax for 1939.

The second category consists of those members of the armed forces who entered upon such service in the taxable year beginning in 1943. The taxes to be abated, credited, or refunded in respect of this class are: (1) that portion of the tax for the taxable year beginning in 1943 (not including the increase in such tax prescribed by the "windfall" provision contained in section 6 (c) of the Senate bill), which bears the same ratio to the total tax (not including such increase) as the number of quarters in such taxable year subsequent to the date on which he entered upon such service bears to four, to the extent such portion is attributable to earned net income; and (2) the tax attributable to earned net income for all subsequent taxable years during which he was in such service.

The third category is made up of those members who entered upon such service after the end of the taxable year beginning in 1943. The taxes to be abated, credited, or refunded in respect of this group are all the taxes which are attributable to earned net income for the taxable years during which they were in such service but not including the taxable year during which they entered upon such service.

In computing the tax to be abated, credited, or refunded under (3) of the first category and (1) of the second category, a fractional part of a quarter subsequent to the date on which he entered upon such service or September 16, 1940, whichever date is the later, shall be disregarded unless it exceeds 15 days, in which case it shall be considered a quarter.

CONFERENCE AMENDMENT

The conference amendment adopts the provisions of the House bill, but extends the application of those provisions to a member of the military or naval forces of any of the other United Nations. The provisions will therefore cover such individuals as well as members of the military or naval forces of the United States.

Assistant Commissioners

Section 9 of the Senate bill amends the Internal Revenue Code to authorize the appointment of two Assistant Commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The amendment provides that the Assistant Commissioners shall perform such duties as may be prescribed by the Commissioner or required by law. There was no comparable provision in the House bill. The conference amendment retains this provision.

Powers of Appointment

Section 10 of the Senate bill extends the time in connection with the release of powers of appointment for estate and gift tax purposes from July 1, 1943, to March 1, 1944. There was no comparable provision in the House bill. The conference amendment retains this provision.

CURRENT TAX PAYMENT ACT OF 1943

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, after 4 months of arduous and strenuous work by the Committee on Ways and Means, we are today, as far as our committee and the House of Representatives are concerned, to write the last chapter in a bill providing for the current collection of individual income taxes. This has been one of the most difficult, as well as one of the most controversial and troublesome, bills with which our committee has ever had to deal. The House can realize, I am sure, some of the difficulties which faced the conference committee. You all remember the fierce battle in the House on the first and second bills which we reported, neither of which was adopted, and also the fight over instructing the conferees to agree to the Senate amendment.

For 8 days the conferees labored, either in joint conference or in individual meetings, in an effort to reach a compromise or an agreement which we hoped would be acceptable to both the House and the Senate. It will be recalled that the bill which the House sent to the Senate had the effect of canceling 100 percent of the 1942 tax liability of 90 percent of all taxpayers, or approximately the tax liability of 35,000,000 taxpayers out of a total of 39,000,000. Since 100 percent of the tax liability of these taxpayers would have been canceled, there was no doubling up of their 1942 and 1943 liability in the bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate. In order to prevent doubling up of the remaining 4,000,000 taxpayers, the House bill did not place them on a current basis with respect to that part of their liability above the first-bracket rate. This bill canceled, in the aggregate, approximately 77 percent of the total 1942 liability, or a total of $7,600,000,000.

The Senate struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and passed a bill with the following features:

First. It provided for a withholding system as did the House bill.

Second. It provided for a special treatment for the armed forces, as did the House bill, but changed the House provisions.

Third. The Senate bill, with the exception of the windfall provision, canceled 100 percent of the 1942 tax liability. With the windfall provisions, the Senate bill canceled about 87 percent of the 1942 tax liability.

Thus, the bills of the House and of the Senate were in direct conflict on the all-important matters of the amount of cancelation and the method of cancelation necessary to make a transition to a current system of payments.

One of the most difficult problems with which our conferees were faced was the insistence of the Senate conferees that the total abatement or forgiveness be at least equal to the aggregate cancelation provided in the House bill. The Senate conferees were adamant also at the outset in their position as to an equal percentage of cancelation of the tax "straight across the board" for all taxpayers.

The conferees discussed various plans for compromise for a period of at least 5 days, and remained in seemingly hopeless deadlock. The House conferees would not accept the Senate bill; neither would the Senate conferees accept the House bill; and as a result we discussed and voted on various other proposals, one bill, the last bill reported by the committee to the House, another a flat 50 percent abatement of the 1942 tax or the lower of the 1942 or 1943 tax, another a 60 percent "straight down the line" abatement, but none of these proposals made by the House conferees, while having a majority vote of the House conferees, could secure a majority vote of both the House and Senate conferees. Finally, a proposal was made which 10 of the conferees were seemingly willing to accept. This provided for a 100-percent abatement of the lower of the 1942 or 1943 tax liability, where the tax was $50 or less, with a notch provision to take care of persons whose tax liability slightly exceeded $50. The notch provision allowed a flat $50 abatement to those taxpayers whose tax was between $50 and $66.67. Other taxpayers would have 75 percent of their tax for the lower of the 2 years, 1942 or 1943, abated. Special relief provisions were added to take care of the taxpayers in the armed forces together with antiwindfall provisions to prevent abatement of that part of the tax on war profits.

During the long consideration and discussion of this controversial subject, may I call the attention of the House to the fact, in showing how difficult the problem has been, that at no time was there ever a unanimous vote on any proposal relating to this subject either in the executive sessions of our committee, on the floor of the House on three separate occasions, or in the conference committee. The first and only time when there was a majority of both House and Senate conferees was on the final vote which stood 11 to 3. On this vote, the Senate conferees were unanimous and the House group stood 4 to 3. May I add further that this was the only vote ever taken in the conference, in which the majority members of the House conferees did not vote together. Having been unable to get the Senate conferees to agree on a graduated abatement of the 1942 liability, except to the extent of a $50 tax, the majority of the House conferees yielded on this point, in order to get a bill, and voted on two different motions for a "straight across the board" abatement. One motion was for a flat abatement of 50 percent, and the other for a 60-percent abatement. Accordingly, the only difference in the last analysis was the extent to which the House conferees would go in total abatement, the principle of straight across the board having been yielded in two votes. But the Senate conferees would not go below a 75-percent abatement, pointing out that the House bill provided for an abatement of 77 percent of the 1942 liability. Our House conferees having already yielded on the differential in the motions for a straight 50 and then a 60-percent abatement, I did not feel justified in being responsible for the failure to reach an agreement because of a mere difference of 15 percent, especially as such a failure would end any hope of getting a current collection system in operation this year. The following examples will show the tax effect of the differences between a 60 percent and a 75-percent abatement:

Married persons, no dependents

Net income before personal exemption	1942 tax	60 percent forgiven	75 percent forgiven	Difference
$10,000	$2,152	$1,291.20	$1,614	$322.80
$100,000	64,000	38,436.00	48,045	9,609.00
$1,000,000	854,000	512,400.00	640,500	128,100.00
$5,000,000	4,374,000	2,624,400.00	3,280,500	656,100.00

Moreover, in terms of total revenue, a 60-percent abatement would abate only 15 percent, or one and one-half billions less than a 75-percent abatement. One very important point to be considered was whether it would not be better to collect less with less postponement or the possibility of more with longer postponement. Under a 60-percent forgiveness, the amount not canceled would have to be spread over a period of at least 4 years in order to prevent undue hardship in the upper brackets. With a 75-percent abatement, the entire amount of the forgiven 1942 liability could be collected in 2 years, and taxpayers will have this back liability out of the way by March 15, 1945. Under a 60-percent abatement, this back liability will not be liquidated until March 15, 1947. It is better to secure this revenue now when incomes are rising than to postpone its collection to some future date when incomes are falling. Furthermore, under a 75-percent abatement, we will collect 25 percent of the 1942 liability by March 15, 1945, whereas under a 60-percent abatement we would collect only 20 percent of the 1942 liability by March 15, 1945.

I will now briefly discuss other important features of the conference agreement:

There are two antiwindfall provisions in the bill. One of these provisions limits the tax to be abated to the lower year, 1942 or 1943. It was recognized that this provision would work an undue hardship on persons who were in the service in 1942 or 1943. Since their tax in 1943 will in most cases be lower than their 1942 tax, to prevent such a hardship a special rule is provided with respect to the 1942 tax of persons in the service in 1942 or 1943. Instead of collecting the full 1942 tax, that part of the 1942 tax liability relating to earned income, which a civilian would have to add to his 1943 tax, is forgiven in the case of the serviceman. This will afford relief to persons in the armed forces whose earned net income in 1942 was considerably higher than their service pay for 1943. The following example will make this clear:

Assume a soldier who is married with no dependents had a net income of $3,200 in 1942. His tax for 1942 amounted to $360.80. He entered the Army in 1943 and had no tax to pay. His 1942 liability will be canceled. Not only does the conference agreement afford relief to servicemen as to their 1942 liability, but also as to their liability for 1943 and subsequent years. Under the conference agreement, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States, during the present war, is allowed, in arriving at his income subject to tax for 1943 and subsequent years, to exclude $1,500 of his military pay. This allowance is in addition to his personal exemption and credit-for-dependents allowance. The conference agreement also allows this $1,500 exclusion to American citizens or residents of the United States serving with our allies. The Senate had a rather involved provision relating to the income tax of a man dying in the service. We were able to get the Senate conferees to accept the House provision in preference to their own, with the qualification that this relief should also be extended to persons serving in the armies of the other Allied Nations. I will not take the time of the House to discuss further changes, as they are fully set forth in the conference report.

I will now discuss the second windfall provision.

It was thought necessary to guard against windfalls during the war period, to limit the amount of the abatement to the equivalent of a tax on a normal year plus $20,000. For his normal year the taxpayer may choose any one of the years 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940.

The conference agreement will put into operation a withholding system as of July 1 of this year. It will also meet the public demand for a current pay-as-you-go system, and will bring into the Treasury more revenue than either the House bill or the Senate bill. For the fiscal year 1944 the conference committee report will add approximately three billions more than the existing law or the House bill, and almost two billions more than the Senate bill. It puts all the taxpayers upon a current basis. A differential is provided in the case of the smaller taxpayers by allowing an abatement of 100 percent of the tax liability of the lesser year, 1942 or 1943, which does not exceed $50. While the compromise was not a perfect solution of the problem, it did, in my opinion, meet many of the defects contained in the Senate bill. I therefore did not feel justified in standing in the way of getting a bill, which the country was demanding, and which was so important from the standpoint of the immediate revenue needs of the Treasury. Accordingly, I felt it to be my duty to cast my vote with the 10 other members of the conference who were willing to support the compromise proposal.

Considering both the House and Senate bills which were before the conference, I do not believe anyone can say that the House conferees got the worst of the bargain, or that anything better was possible under the circumstances, if a current tax system was to be enacted at this session or during this Congress. It was either this compromise or no bill, as I am sure everyone familiar with the subject must realize.

In closing, I wish to present the following table, which shows how much revenue is collected under the conference agreement as compared with the House and Senate bills:

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I find myself in disagreement with the distinguished and beloved chairman of my committee. We have worked shoulder to shoulder in many legislative battles during recent years and have tried to be mutually helpful to each other. We have seldom disagreed, but on this occasion we are conscientiously and honestly unable to agree on this conference report. I am sure he accords to me the same sincerity of purpose that I very cheerfully accord to him. Three of the four Democratic House conferees did not sign the conference report, and I am one of those.

It is my conviction that the effect of this bill is to transfer an unfair and unjust part of the financial burden of this war from the wealthy to the lower income group of the people, and I am unable to support it.

You have been urging pay-as-you-go legislation. You started out to get taxpayers current and wind up here with a bill that gets less of them current than almost any plan that has been proposed. The result of your effort is to pass a bill that does not get taxpayers current, but only accomplishes the real purpose of forgiving taxes already due the Government and in many instances already paid.

The House, by a vote of 313 to 95, sent to the Senate a pay-as-you-go tax bill which forgave a total of about seven and one-half billion dollars. The conferees have brought back to the House a bill effectively forgiving about eight and one-half billion dollars of tax, after allowing for windfall provisions. A special tax of 25 percent on the lower of the liabilities of 1942 or 1943 further reduces the effective forgiveness under the conference bill to about six and one-half billion dollars. Because the amounts forgiven under the House bill and under the bill brought back in the conference report do not differ widely, you have been told, and you no doubt will be told again, that this conference bill closely resembles the House bill and represents a substantial acceptance of the House bill. Quite the contrary is the truth.

The bill which the House sent to the Senate made 40,000,000 taxpayers completely and immediately current. The bill returned by the Senate to the House also made these 40,000,000 taxpayers completely and immediately current. This bill makes only 5,000,000 taxpayers current. The bill reported by the conferees, however, retains one-fourth of a year's tax liability on about 33,000,000 of these 40,000,000 taxpayers.

Who, then, gets from this bill the benefit of the amount improperly reimposed on these 33,000,000 taxpayers? The answer is that the tax which has been reimposed on these 33,000,000 taxpayers has been removed from the shoulders of about 380,000 taxpayers with incomes above $10,000. The $10,000 mark is about the breaking point in comparing the difference between the House bill and the conference report. Taxpayers with incomes of less than $10,000 realize much less forgiveness under the conference bill than under the House bill and taxpayers with incomes above $10,000 realize much greater forgiveness under the conference bill than under the House bill. That is what this conference bill does. It completely redistributes the burden of tax for the year 1942, and departs violently from the distribution of that tax under the House bill.

Let me give you some examples to illustrate the difference between the House bill and the conference bill.

A married couple with an income of $3,000 is forgiven $324 under the House bill, and only $243 under this bill.

A married couple with an income of $5,000 is forgiven $691 under the House bill and only $560 under this bill.

A taxpayer with an income of $25,000 is forgiven $4,437 under the House bill and $6,915 under this bill.

A taxpayer with an income of $50,000 is forgiven $9,185 under the House bill and $18,996 under the bill before you.

A taxpayer with an income of $100,000 is forgiven $18,690 under the House bill and $48,045 under the bill before you.

Under the House bill a married taxpayer with an income of $1,000,000 is forgiven $189,750, while under the bill before you he is forgiven $640,500.

Under the House bill the amount forgiven for those with net incomes over $10,000 amounts to $1,512,000,000 out of a total liability for these incomes of $3,555,000,000, or 42.5 percent. Under the conference bill the corresponding amounts of the effective forgiveness, after allowing for the windfall provisions and the special 25-percent tax, are $2,213,000,000 out of $3,555,000,000, or 62.3 percent. The amount forgiven under the House bill is about seven and one-half billions and under the conference bill about six and one-half billions. The amounts forgiven for incomes over $10,000 are 20 percent of the total forgiveness under the House bill as against 34 percent under the conference bill.

Thus, it is seen clearly that the effect of the bill which has been brought back to us by a majority of the conferees lifts the burden from the shoulders of a few large taxpayers and places it on the shoulders of millions of small taxpayers.

This bill retains in its essential characteristics the same basic inequities present in the Ruml-Carlson bill, which this House on three separate and distinct occasions rejected. In this bill the taxpayer with a $3,000 income is forgiven an amount equal to nearly 5 weeks of income after taxes; the taxpayer with the $100,000 income is forgiven an amount equal to 15 months of income after taxes. This is the same Ruml-Carlson bill that we turned down before it was reduced to three-quarter size.

The reduction of the Ruml-Carlson bill to three-quarter size not only does not remove its basic inequities; in many ways it makes the bill even worse than the full Ruml-Carlson bill which we found so objectionable. This bill makes only 5,000,000 taxpayers current. The House bill makes 40,000,000 taxpayers current. The 4,000,000 which the House bill did not make current are those for whom current payment is not necessary and in many cases is not convenient or feasible. The 33,000,000 additional taxpayers, which the bill before you does not make current for 2 years, are the ones most in need of being made current. They are the ones for whom the hearts of the Ruml-Carlson proponents bled when the Ways and Means Committee bill was before the House.

More serious is the fact that this bill will interfere with the adoption of the kind of tax bill we must have if this war is to be properly financed and economic disruption in this country is to be prevented or kept to a minimum. By providing for a 12½ percent collection of the 1942 tax in the coming year and another 12½ percent in the year following, this bill will almost certainly interfere seriously with the imposition of the additional taxes which are so badly required. Statements were made on the floor of the Senate that a 75 percent forgiveness would give increases in collection over the next 2 years which would take the place of tax increase on incomes. At a time when the President of the United States has asked for an additional $16,000,000,000 in taxes or savings, or both, and when every indication points to the need of at least that amount for financing the war and blocking the development of serious inflation, we are placing ourselves in the position of making the necessary increases very difficult to get.

There is not only the fact that a small increase in receipts into the Treasury for the next 2 years under this bill stands in the way of increased taxes on individual incomes. There is also the fact that the cancelation of taxes under this bill is, as I have pointed out, grossly inequitable. When a new tax measure comes up it will be necessary to go to the small and middle incomes in order to get the great bulk of the revenue under that measure. This is for the simple reason that large incomes are already paying rates which cannot be increased in any great degree. It will be a serious matter to impose on the lower income group tax increases which will more than take away from them the amounts forgiven under this bill, while at the same time the higher income groups are not subjected to increases which offset or even greatly reduce the benefits they would receive under this bill. The net benefits accruing to the large income groups will present an enormous obstacle in placing heavy tax increases on low income groups.

Accordingly, I say that although the Ruml-Carlson bill would interfere seriously with a new tax bill because of its inequity, this bill will interfere even more with a proper tax bill because it confuses the issue through the 12½ percent collection of 1942 tax liability this year and next year. The President has asked us for $16,000,000,000. This bill forgives about $6,500,000,000 and places a heavy obstacle on the increase of tax rates necessary to even distantly approach the $16,000,000,000 request of the President.

The proponents of this measure point to some increase in revenue not only from the payment over 2 years of 25 percent of the 1942 tax, but to the operation of two so-called windfall provisions. These windfall provisions are a clear admission that the principle of the Ruml-Carlson bill, followed in the bill which the conferees have returned to the House, is inequitable and must be made to appear more presentable than it really is. The first of these provisions is to forgive the lower of the 1942 or 1943 tax. That is supposed to catch a person with an abnormally high income in 1942. No doubt it does so. But it also catches, and I suggest catches a great many more people whose 1943 incomes are abnormally low because of shortages, priorities, and other inevitable results from the war. We know that hundreds of thousands of small businessmen, for example, are suffering heavily in 1943. This windfall provision will catch them and label them as having abnormally high incomes in 1942. Millions of people for whom the relief of pay-as-you-go was intended will receive relatively little of its benefit under this windfall provision.

The second windfall provision is intended to catch people whose incomes in 1942 or 1943 were higher than in 1940, 1939, 1938, or 1937. It is intended to catch the war profiteers. No doubt it does catch some of them. But it also catches many innocent businessmen whose earnings were abnormally low in those pre-war years and who now must pay 1942 taxes on the excess just as though they were war profiteers. Moreover, I would point out that the conferees found it desirable to insert a provision that if a partnership has absorbed a corporation, then the partner's income shall be computed on the basis of the corporate income for 1940, 1939 1938, and 1937, in order that a proper base-period income may be reconstructed. This is no doubt an equitable provision, but there are literally dozens, perhaps hundreds of other types of cases much more important than this very rare situation which will call out for similar relief. We are going to be faced in the application of this windfall provision with all the difficulty and problems we have gone through in trying to give general relief for persons with abnormally low base-period earnings under the excess-profits tax. This second windfall provision fires a shotgun into a crowd. It catches many innocent people and opens the door to, in fact demands, a multiplicity of further amendments to prevent the harsh operation of the provision.

The House bill did not need windfall provisions of this kind because its distribution of cancelation was equitable. It avoided the basic windfall which the large income receiver gets out of the bill before you and which no windfall provision touches.

Sincerely believing that this bill does not include the essential elements of fairness and equity to the taxpayers of the country, and that the price paid in forgiveness is too great to pay for the desirable results of accomplishing a pay-as-you-go system, I am not in a position to give it my support.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the consideration of the conference report it might be well to bear in mind that the House on two different occasions came within four votes of adopting the Carlson bill, which involved substantially 100-percent abatement. We present you the best compromise that we were able to work out after 5 days of hard and grueling work in conference. The Senate conferees voted as a unit on every proposition that came up, until one of the majority Senators announced that he would thenceforth vote for every compromise because he did not want it to go to the country that Congress is unable to function and that his party is unequal to the occasion.

The responsibility for enacting a tax bill and for getting the people of the country on a current basis does not rest with the minority, it rests with the party in power, but we have cooperated 100 percent. There was no politics in the conference; none whatever. This is shown by the fact that Senator GEORGE, Senator WALSH, Senator CLARK, and Senator BYRD voted with three Republican Senate conferees, or should I say the three Senate Republican conferees voted with the four Democratic Senators whom I have named.

Those who are opposed to the report we have brought before you would have you believe that the Federal Treasury is going to lose enormous sums of money if it is adopted. The contrary is the case. Under the existing law, the Treasury will take in $12,999,000,000 in the next fiscal year. Under the House bill the Treasury would take in $13,022,000,000. Under the Senate bill, the Treasury would take in $14,912,000,000. Under the conference report, the Treasury will take in $16,005,000,000. These figures are not mine; they are from the Treasury Department.

Speaking now to those on this side of the House who wanted complete abatement, may I say that it was out of the question to attain that end. I am not entirely satisfied with the report we are presenting to you. It is a compromise. That is the reason the bill was sent to conference, to iron out the differences between the two Houses and try to work out a reasonable compromise. I think we have done so, notwithstanding the statements of the preceding speaker.

The American people want to be put on a current, pay-as-they-earn basis. Under the conference compromise, practically all of them, over 40,000,000, will be made current within 2 years. We could not do any better.

I ask you, as one American to another, can we afford to say to the country that we are not capable of rising to the occasion when an emergency exists? This country is at war. The cry is for revenue to wage that war. Let me ask you on the majority side, you whose primary responsibility it is to place people on a current pay-as-they-earn basis, What will the reaction of the country be to you if you fail them in this momentous hour? Ponder on that. That point was brought out by two distinguished Senators who belong to the majority party. Both of them said it would be one of the most unfortunate things that has happened in a long time if the conference report should perchance fail of adoption. Failure would be a serious indictment of representative government.

At this time I wish to pay tribute to one of the noblest Romans I have ever served with, the chairman of this committee, the beloved gentleman from North Carolina, "Marse" BOB DOUGHTON. He recognized the emergency, he recognized the need for action, as did all of those who signed the conference report, and he was big enough to sweep partisan considerations and personal views aside and rise to the occasion. God bless him. I hope he stays in this House another 100 years.

At this point I shall offer for the RECORD a brief explanation of how the bill will operate.

Let us take the situation with which we are all familiar—our own income. In the case of a Member of Congress, with a $10,000 salary, his tax liability for 1942 was approximately $2,000 if he is a married man with no dependents. He filed a return last March 15 and presumably paid his first installment of $500 on his 1942 liability.

Under the proposed new law, the second installment on the the 1942 liability must also be paid. It is due June 15. Thus by July 1, when the withholding tax begins, he will have paid one-half his 1942 liability.

Under the conference report, all amounts paid on the 1942 liability will be applied against the current 1943 liability.

Beginning July 1, the Sergeant at Arms of the House, who is the official paymaster, will begin deducting the new withholding tax from each Member's salary. This is not an additional tax, but is for the purpose of collecting the income tax at the source. In the lowest surtax bracket, it will result in collecting the full liability at the source, but as the tax liability of Members of Congress extends beyond the first bracket only part of their liability will be collected through the withholding tax. The balance will be paid in installments. The withholding tax is 20 percent of the wage or salary in excess of the withholding exemption, which is $52 a month for single persons and $104 a month for married persons. Thus the withholding on a Congressman who is a married man with no dependents would be 20 percent of the excess of the monthly salary, $833.33, over the monthly exemption, $104. This would be 20 percent of $729.33, or $145.87. This amount will be deducted monthly, and may be credited toward the 1943 liability.

On September 15, Members of Congress, like everyone else subject to income tax, will file a tentative return of estimated tax on their 1943 income. Assuming the Member's income for 1943 is the same as for 1942, the 1943 tax will nevertheless be greater because of the Victory tax, which became effective January 1, 1943. In the case of a married man with no dependents, the total tax on an income of $10,000, including net Victory tax, would be $2,467. By June 15 the Member would have paid half his 1942 assessment, or $1,000, which would be credited on the 1943 liability. Also he would have had deducted from his salary up to July 1, on account of the present Victory tax withholding, approximately $234.40, which would make a total of $1,234.40 standing to his account as of July 1. Thus for the remainder of the year he would owe the difference between this amount, $1,234.40, and $2,467, or $1,232.60. During the remainder of the year, however, there will be withheld from his salary $145.87 per month under the withholding tax, which in the last 6 months of the year would total $875.22. Thus, of the $1,232.60 still owed on his 1943 liability for the last half of the year, all but $357.38 will be collected at the source. This balance he will pay in two installments, one-half on September 15 and one-half on December 15. On March 15, 1944, he will file his final return for the year and make any necessary adjustments on account of overpayment or underpayment. At that time, on the same form, he will file his return of estimated tax for 1944, and will pay in installments so much of his tax liability for the year as is not being collected at the source.

The next question is, What happens to the 1942 tax liability under the bill? Seventy-five percent of this liability is abated under the bill, and the remaining 25 percent is collected over a period of 2 years in addition to current taxes. In the example cited, the 1942 tax was $2,000. Thus $500 of the 1942 assessment would be collected under the bill, one-half, or $250, being payable March 15, 1944, and the remaining one-half on March 15, 1945.

If a Member had a higher tax liability on his 1942 income than will be due on his 1943 income, then his 1943 tax would be based on the higher income of the 2 years, and the 75-percent abatement would apply to the lower income of the 2 years.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FORAND].

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the conference report now before us is the old Ruml plan in a new dress, and I shall vote against it.

The only difference between this report and the original Ruml plan, which would forgive 100 percent of a year's tax, is that the conference report reduces the forgiveness to 75 percent. Both operate on the same principle of percentage forgiveness rather than on a forgiveness based on a number of tax units as was provided in my bill, which passed the House on May 4.

This means that at a later date, through higher rates, the Treasury will recover from the lower- and middle-bracket taxpayer every dollar now forgiven him plus that amount forgiven to those in the upper brackets. In other words, it will collect from the lower- and middle-income groups to compensate for the bonus now being declared for the wealthy, the upper income group. The poor will pay for the benefit given to the rich.

Why do I say that? Because the incontrovertible proof stands out before our eyes.

It is generally agreed that the rate of 85.4 percent on incomes of $1,000,000 is so high that it cannot be raised. To go any higher would amount to confiscation. It would be practically a capital levy. So when you forgive 75 percent of a year's tax to an individual with an income of $1,000,000, which, under the provisions of this legislation amounts to $640,000, you make an outright gift, you give him a bonus, and you cannot get any of it back when you increase the tax rate.

This is not true in the middle and lower brackets. On those taxpayers you will raise the rates, and you are going to do it sooner or later. Any statement to the contrary is questionable as to its veracity. It is an attempt to fool the taxpayer.

Our national debt, we are told, will run up to $300,000,000,000 before this war is over. That debt must be paid. You cannot raise the rates for the large income so, after forgiving huge sums to the rich, you will raise the rates for the low- and middle-income groups to collect the money necessary to pay that debt. Such procedure, Mr. Speaker, is unfair and unjust to the small taxpayers. It is unfair and unjust to the white-collar class, and I shall not be a party to it. I shall vote against the report.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us is supposed to be a compromise of the House and Senate pay-as-you-go bills. It is not my idea of a compromise. It uproots the principle we endorsed in the House bill by a vote of 3 to 1 and transplants in its place the principle adopted by the Senate. It grafts onto the transplanted Senate principle a few miscellaneous provisions to make a prettier display. But basically what we have before us is simply the Ruml plan set to three-quarter time. It is off key, it grates on my ears, it is all disharmony.

When the pay-as-you-go bill was sent to the Senate by this House it did what we needed to do, in a fair and reasonably simple way. It put the bulk of income tax on a current basis and abated enough of the tax to avoid hardship in the process of transition. In that bill, tax cancelation did what it was supposed to do. It was a means to the end of getting on a pay-as-you-go basis. But since it left this House, the end has been sacrificed to the means, and cancelation has become the basis for the biggest tax grab in history.

The bill presented to us by the conference committee is the product of a dog fight on the size and distribution of the tax grab and not on the principles of pay-as-you-go. There is nothing sound, nothing sensible, about the tax-forgiveness features of this bill. All they do is to specify how far each taxpayer can dip into the grab bag. The rule of thumb applied in forgiving taxes is simply this—the bigger your income, the deeper you reach into the grab bag of tax forgiveness.

By all odds, the prime beneficiaries of tax forgiveness under the conference committee bill are the taxpayers with incomes about $10,000. There are $380,000 taxpayers with incomes above $10,000. They represent less than 1 percent of the total of 44,000,000 taxpayers. Yet, their cut of forgiveness is not 1 percent, or 5 percent, or even 10 percent. Oh, no; their cut is 34 percent of the entire amount of taxes forgiven under the Ruml-ized bill now before us. More than one-third of the total forgiveness goes to 1 percent of the taxpayers. Their cut is large and juicy indeed. Some people call that the principle of equality of treatment. I do not care much for a "principle of equality" which produces such gross inequality in practice and revitalizes the danger of inflation—or is the danger of inflation confined to the little fellow?

There has been some attempt to justify this wicked tax grab on the ground that the tax gift is not realized until death or until income slacks off. The Ruml-ites do not deny that tax forgiveness is a gift. They simply try to cloud the issue and say it is not realized right away. I think we can decide for ourselves whether or not it is realized right away. Find me a $10,000 income man, for example, who does not salt away some funds to pay his taxes. You simply will not find him. If this bill becomes law, the funds the taxpayers have been salting away for payment of 1942 taxes will not have to be used for taxes. Taxpayers will be paying as they go and will be using current funds, not accumulated funds, to pay off their taxes. The money they set aside to pay 1942 taxes will be cash on hand. It will be money that can be added to the taxpayer's wealth or spent in inflationary buying. It will be an immediate tangible gift to the taxpayer to do with what he may. That is why forgiveness has become so popular. It is not just forgiveness to get pay-as-you-go. It is forgiveness for the sake of forgiving.

Who is going to pay for this forgiveness? After all, you cannot subsidize the rich without having someone paying for it. And that someone is bound to be the millions of Toms, Dicks, and Harrys in our taxpaying population, the millions of taxpayers in the lower and middle brackets. After all, it is their rates which are mathematically capable of expansion. You cannot boost a 90-percent rate very far, but a 20, 30, or 40 percent rate lends itself to expansion. To get back the taxes canceled by this bill, you would have to raise the tax on a man with a $2,000 net income from $220 to $350. Or if his income were only $1,500 his tax would have to go up from $78 to $170. If his income were $3,000, his tax would have to be raised from $504 to $702.

In other words to offset the tax forgiveness to the wealthy, you would have to double the tax rates of the great majority of average citizens. Apparently, doubling up of taxes is good enough for the little fellow, but the big fellow under this bill slices up the biggest pork pie in history.

I have but a very short time to deal with the facts as they pertain to the conference report but I can best illustrate my views in the matter by comparing the report and its effect upon the Congress and people of the United States by saying that it is a legislative toadstool. To some it may look like the real thing but it is dangerous in that it is political poison. After this warning each and every Member of this House is on his or her own. If you suffer the ill effects of partaking of this dish, it is your own funeral, not mine.

Up to this point I have been talking about the fabric of the bill. Now, I want to take a look at the embroidery which has been attached to the bill to sell it to this Congress and to the people of this country. When I look at this frill of antiwindfall provisions and a 25-percent carry-over of the 1942 tax, I can only conclude that we are being lured to walk into an elaborately baited trap. Some of that bait looks pretty attractive and on the surface appears to improve the bill. Actually, the special provisions of this bill are merely an attempt to hoodwink and befuddle us and to camouflage the tax grab, which is the real core of the bill.

Limitation of forgiveness to 75 percent of the 1942 tax is supposed to be a major improvement. But it is still the Ruml principle, pure and simple. It still confers a permanent and irretrievable gift on the wealthy which is all out of proportion to the "Indian gift" that it confers on the average citizen. Let us not delude ourselves. This is simply the Ruml plan set to different music. It simply sings the Ruml lullaby in three-four time, instead of four-four time. And it reserves a special time for the little taxpayer—he gets the two time. He gets the least of tax forgiveness, but he will get most of the tax increases when the next tax bill comes up. Look out for the sales tax and the increased income tax rates which are to follow.

Now, how about this one-quarter of the tax that is not abated but spread over a 2-year period? A lot of loose talk would have us believe that this carry-over of 25 percent is a substitute for tax increases. That kind of talk is sheer bunk and nonsense. First of all, under the conference committee bill, we will be paying only 2¼ years' taxes on 3 years' income. I do not know how you can call that quarter a tax increase when it is really a reduction of a tax liability already incurred. Second, it is ridiculous to speak of substituting the 25-percent carry-over for the tax increases we have to have to finance this war. What do the war profiteers expect? An enormous tax subsidy plus insurance against tax increases? That is asking too much, and we will be failing our duty on the home front if we adopt such an unrealistic program. The boys now in uniform will be asking questions when you begin to lay this load on their shoulders. It will prove embarrassing if you vote for this bill.

The so-called antiwindfall provisions of the bill before us also call for close scrutiny. As I understand it, antiwindfall provisions are supposed to be studded with teeth that bite into objectionable windfalls. Gentlemen, the provisions before us are toothless. They fail to strike at the basic inequity of the bill. They do not even touch the distorted structure of tax forgiveness under the Ruml principle on which it is based.

It is true that these so-called antiwindfall provisions will reduce the amount of forgiveness by about one and one-fourth billion dollars. But that reduction is made not at the expense of those who are unjustifiably enriched by war profiteering or those who are unjustifiably enriched by tax forgiveness—no, those reductions are made primarily at the expense of persons whose income happens to fall off in 1943. This bill makes a decline in income from 1942 to 1943 prima facie evidence of war profiteering. You and I know that such declines have occurred in millions of cases because war has offset peacetime activities and not necessarily because war inflated 1942 incomes. Basing tax forgiveness on the smaller of 1942 and 1943 taxes tars the innocent victim of war's dislocations with the same brush as the guilty war profiteer.

The bill also contains a provision for a special tax on excess income in wartime. This bill was so liberalized and watered down by the conference committee that it catches only a few fish in its net. Among those fish are not merely war profiteers but people who are just coming into their own as a result of long and diligent effort. Gentlemen, this bill simply does not recognize the difference between right and wrong. In this bill black and white have become fused into a dirty gray.

No amount of camouflage can hide the ugly fact that this bill hands out an unjust and discriminatory enrichment in the midst of a cruel and costly war. While American boys are dying on battlefields all over the world we have the spectacle on the home front of taxpayers feasting on the carcass of 1942 taxes. This is not a pretty picture, yet it is precisely what we are doing if we pass the conference committee bill. I want no part of a bill which matches the sacrifices being made on the battle fronts with unjust enrichment on the home front.

I want to point out that the percentage differential in the forgiveness was definitely and hopelessly rejected but when in the final analysis I sought a differential on the basis of earned and unearned income, in other words, on a basis of such income as a man works and sweats for and such income as is gathered from coupon clipping, a principle which is well established in tax law allowing exemptions and variations, this, too, was turned down by the conferees and is not in the bill.

To show you how solicitous the conferees must have been about the greatest possible remission of taxes which are due the Federal Government from the upper-bracket taxpayers, they would not allow any kind of differential either in percentages or on a basis of earned and unearned income, but when it came to the consideration of the amendment which was offered by me in the Committee on Ways and Means and approved by the House, having to do with abatement of such taxes as might be due and payable from a soldier, sailor, or marine who forfeits his life and his all for his Government, the conferees, with the assistance of the minority Members on the House side, retained until the last day the Senate provision which made of my original proposal a sham, a joke, and an insult to our heroic warrior dead because in their case it made a distinction between earned and unearned income. When on the last day of the conference I threatened to disembowel the report, the conferees, led by the minority of the House, backed off and the curse was erased.

Just imagine the courage of conferees who excluded from consideration the earned- and unearned-income distinctions because it would affect adversely the amount of irretrievable forgiveness granted to the upper-bracket taxpayers while at the same time insisting on making this distinction and applying it to a soldier hero who gave his life for his country and the conferees insisted that tax forgiveness would be allowed only on the earned income but if the soldier had sold his home and showed a profit of $500 to $1,000 or clipped a small amount of dividend coupons, he would have to pay unto the last cent and upon death it would be taken out of the amount collected from his estate, but the taxpayer with a million-dollar income from coupon clipping would receive without differentiation, the full 75 percent of remission provided for in the conference report. The conferees were frightened into the path of political righteousness by my warning. My original amendment, contained in the House bill, is now in the conference bill.

These are important reasons why I cannot vote for the conference report, and I urge that it be voted down for we would be far better off to remain on the tried and true basis than to create further and sinful inequalities. Remember when you vote for this bill you vote for eventual reimposition of all of the forgiveness and the great bulk of the recapture of the taxes so ruthlessly thrown away at this time will have to come from the lowermost brackets, from the millions of men and women who are least able to bear the load and who already are overburdened.

Let me warn you that there will be no hesitation, in fact there will be an outright demand later to impose a Federal sales tax, not of 2 or 3 percent but possibly 10, 15, or maybe 20 percent. Imagine a man with a wife and four, five, or six little children paying through the nose to make up for the remission, for the congressional gift to those in the highest brackets, who cannot be made to pay under any system of reassessment. To that class of big taxpayers it will be an outright and irretrievable bonus, the equivalent of all the tax increases which we have imposed upon them in the past 5 years. In this class you will find many of the type of Heintz and Jacks, wartime profiteers. Some people will be permitted to retain millions in war profits and will keep them with congressional approval while the small taxpayer will be scalped. Those who will vote to approve this conference report will either do it blindly or feign to believe that there is no threat to inflation while they contend that a few extra dollars in the pocket of the little fellow threatens our very existence. A surplus dollar with no place to go, whether in the pocket of a rich man or a poor man, unless invested in a War bond, is a threat to inflation.

I am going to be free to follow the proper course when the next tax bill comes up. My position will not only be defensible but absolutely impregnable, but some of you Members here who are going to impress your imprimatur upon this conference report are going to have the time of your lives making explanations to your constituents when the next campaign rolls around. Any candidate passing an I. Q. test of a 14-year-old boy who will make an issue of your vote in support of this iniquitous proposal will drive you out of Congress.

Should the conference report prevail, I am of the impression that the President should and will veto the bill because there is nothing wrong with our present tax system, and while it may be desirable to establish the system of paying as you go and collecting at the source, it is not worth the price we are called upon to pay for its establishment and the inequalities cannot be justified by any argument.

As time goes on you will find that the attitude of my friend from Tennessee, and my equally distinguished and sincere friend from Oklahoma, with whom I join, will be recognized because it is honest and just, and constitutes a force that is irrepressible.

The principle embodied in the conference report is a typical and time-honored Republican principle of what is fair and equitable. It does not square with the ideals of Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, or Roosevelt; therefore, let the Republicans pass it if they can, and let there be no defections on our side. Let there be no support of this heretical doctrine that remits $75 in the case of one taxpayer, which will later be reassessed three times over, and permits the remission of $750,000 to another taxpayer which cannot be recaptured. This is not equality in treatment, it is inequitable and unjust.

If the House will vote down the conference report, we can bring back a report that will differentiate in a fair way between small and large taxpayers and allow abatement on a percentage basis, and my idea is that it ought to be abated in the same way that it was put on in the 1942 tax bill. There can be no argument about the fairness of taking it off as you put it on, but there is a lot of argument against forgiving 75 percent of all of the tax increases which you, by previous action, applied in the last 5 years.

THE DINGELL PLAN

It will be interesting for the Members of the House to know that I suggested a plan to the House and Senate conferees which, for the want of a better designation, would be known as the Dingell proposal or plan, which would bring about absolute currency in tax collection and would embody the feature of collection at the source without any forgiveness or abatement whatsoever. Currency in payment would be brought about by the simple and gradual change in the practice of collecting income taxes due by setting back the first collection due date and the final date for payment 3 months in each of the coming years except the first year, when the initial set-back would be only 2 months, until full currency was attained. This plan, for a certainty, would work out as regards the individual income taxpayer. There is no challenging that statement. It might even be extended eventually to include corporation income taxes.

To illustrate my plan, an income taxpayer under existing law pays his 1942 tax by making his first or part payment, or even all of it, on or before March 15 of 1943. He must pay the balance of his obligation, if any, under pain of penalty, by December 15, 1943. My plan, aiming at eventual currency, would obligate the taxpayer to pay his 1943 tax by partial or full payment beginning January 15, 1944, with a final payment, if any, payable by October 15, 1944, instead of the customary December 15, as provided under present law. The tax for the following year would be due and payable beginning October of the same year and the final payment would have to be paid on or before July 15 of 1945. Thus each year the grace period would be reduced or revised toward currency until all taxpayers simultaneously became current, and this would be without any remission or forgiveness whatsoever. But this plan was not very attractive because it was not sweetened with full or partial abatement.

Under the plan which the conference submits to the House, such tax payers as are to become current will not attain such classification or status until the end of 1945. I believe, under my plan without any abatement and beginning in the shift of initial payment date in the year 1944, we would be fully current in 1947. I will include in the RECORD a rough sketch or a table which I prepared and believe is readily understandable which will serve as a guide for the membership.

The table follows:

	Last payment due
If 1943 tax due date is moved from Mar. 15 to Jan. 15, 1944	Oct. 15, 1944
If 1944 tax due date is moved from Jan. 15, 1945, to Oct. 15, 1944	July 15, 1945
If 1945 tax due date is moved from Oct. 15 to July 15, 1945	Apr. 15, 1946
If 1946 tax due date is moved from July 15 to Apr. 15, 1946	Jan. 15, 1947
If 1947 tax due date is moved from Apr. 15 to Jan. 15, 1947	[1] Oct. 15, 1947

[1] If desired, when year of currency is attained, final date of payment of taxes could be extended to Dec. 15, 1947.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, an ancient law that I ran onto said that a well-made law should be formulated on the basis of caution, perspicacity, precision, sagacity, and conciseness. I can hardly claim that this particular conference report brings in a bill here which fulfills those requirements. I think this has been one of the hardest tasks I ever faced in this legislative chamber. We are in the midst of war, and it would seem as though we might have gotten together without such a waste of time.

I am not particularly enamored of this conference report, but I feel that I would not be discharging my duty unless I were to vote for it. The people of this country are entitled to know just where they stand so far as this bill is concerned. We started out as a committee in good faith to hold hearings for one specific purpose, and that was to make the people current in the payment of their taxes. The reason for that was known to every person practically in this country. That was that the rates had become so high, and the tax load had increased so rapidly, that to go on under the old system of collecting the taxes a year behind was a dangerous thing, and it would become more dangerous as we proceeded to put on an ever-increasing tax load. Once before I called attention to the fact as to just how rapidly this load has been put on the backs of the people In 1940 the tax load was about $5,387,000,000. In 1941 it was stepped up to $7,607,000,000; in 1942, $12,700,000,000; in 1943, $22,976,000,000; and in 1944, $33,081,000,000. Then you add onto that $10,000,000,000 of local and State taxes, and we are now looking forward to the $16,000,000,000 in addition which the President still insists upon.

Word has gone out to the country that if this bill is passed it will not be necessary to raise the $16,000,000,000. I fail to see where that can possibly be true, because we are going to spend in 1943, $80,000,000,000; in 1944, $104,000,000,000, and we are going to have a debt in 1944 of $210,000,000,000. I fail to see how you can go along here for 2 years, or for 1 year, without another tax bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will recall that in the conference committee it was told us that the adoption of this report would probably obviate the necessity for another personal income tax bill for this year.

Mr. REED of New York. Oh, I have listened to promises from this administration since 1933, and I know of only one that was kept, and that was to make the country wet. That was in 1933. I have a list, comprising almost a volume, of New Deal broken promises, so that I do not attach very much importance to what was said by administration leaders in conference, in regard to additional taxes.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to, but I cannot at this time as I have only a few minutes left.

In order to meet at least a large part of the tremendous outlays now being made for war purposes, totaling over one hundred billions annually, and at the same time aid in the check against ruinous inflation, burdensome taxes must of course be levied. In the past few years the tax load has been increased by leaps and bounds, without giving taxpayers a chance to adjust themselves to each new increase. All the increases have been retroactive in effect, and it is this feature of the recent tax bills which has worked a tremendous hardship on all taxpayers, since they have had no opportunity to prepare for the increased burden, or adjust themselves to it.

The 1942 tax bill, for example, was not enacted until October 21, 1942, after nearly 10 months of the year had gone by, yet it was made applicable to all income earned from January 1, 1942. Most of the responsibility for the delay in the enactment of the 1942 measure was due to the administration's procrastination in formulating its program and its subsequent reversal of position on several major policies. On two occasions the President intervened at the last minute by suggesting changes which were in contravention of the administration's previous position—once in connection with the lowering of personal exemptions, and the other time in connection with the taxation of excess corporate profits.

The high level of present taxes, coupled with the fact that the income tax now reaches the great mass of the people, has aggravated and made more obvious certain fundamental defects in the present tax-collection machinery. One of these defects is that the personal income tax is not collected until the year after the income on which it is based is earned. This works a great hardship on the taxpayer when his income ceases, as at death, retirement, or loss of his job, as well as when his income sharply declines. Under the present collection method the income tax is not actually based on ability to pay, as it is supposed to be, since it is levied on the income of the past year, and not on the income of the current year, out of which it must be paid.

On February 2 of this year, in response to widespread popular demand, the Ways and Means Committee began public hearings on various proposals to place the personal income tax on a current, pay-as-we-go basis. To correct the defects in the present system, it was determined that the income tax should be assessed against current income instead of the past year's income, and be collected out of current income as the income is earned. It was made clear that this change would be of benefit to the Treasury, as well as to taxpayers, since it would tap the higher level of national income 1 year sooner than under existing law and at the same time reduce tax delinquencies.

Among the plans considered by the Ways and Means Committee were the following:

First. Doughton plan No. 1, which, in addition to collecting taxes currently, would have involved substantial doubling up by requiring taxpayers to carry forward their 1942 liability, recomputed at 1941 rates and exemptions, and discharge it over a period of 3 to 5 years.

Second, Doughton plan No. 2, which would have carried forward half the 1942 assessment in the case of all taxpayers and collected this amount in addition to current taxes over a period of 5 years.

Third. The Robertson-Forand plan, which would have made taxpayers current to the extent that their liability did not exceed the amount proposed to be withheld at the source under a 20-percent withholding tax.

Fourth. The Carlson plan, which is a modified Ruml plan, and which would have made all taxpayers immediately current with no doubling up in their payments. This would have been accomplished simply by changing the basis of assessment of 1943 taxes from 1942 income to 1943 income, and by abating the previously assessed 1942 liability.

Of the various plans considered, the Carlson plan was the one plan and the only plan which would make all taxpayers current with no doubling up. The other plans either did not make all taxpayers current, or else delayed the objective for a period of years and in the meantime required substantial doubling up in payments.

In March, the majority of the Ways and Means Committee voted down all pay-as-you-go proposals, and reported to the House a measure which failed to make any taxpayers current, and which would not have permitted any taxpayers to become current except by paying 2 years' taxes in 1 year. Nine Republican members of the committee, who had supported the Carlson plan in committee, offered the proposal as a substitute for the committee bill. It failed of adoption by a vote of 193 to 215. The House then recommitted the wholly unsatisfactory committee bill to the Ways and Means Committee by a vote of 248 to 168.

After reconsideration of the matter the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, on April 30, reported to the House the so-called Doughton No. 1 plan, which, as previously pointed out, involved substantial doubling up as the price for getting taxpayers current after 3 years. Again the Republican members of the committee proposed the Carlson plan as a substitute, and this time it failed of adoption by a margin of only 4 votes, 202 members having voted for the substitute and 206 against. The Republican minority then moved to recommit the committee bill, with instructions to report back the Robertson-Forand bill forthwith, as a substitute. This measure, while it did not make all taxpayers current, did make 90 percent current with no doubling up. It was felt that if this measure were sent to the Senate, the other body would amend it by substituting the Carlson plan. The House adopted the motion to recommit by a vote of 230 to 180. On final passage, the amended bill embracing the Robertson-Forand plan was adopted by a vote of 313 to 95.

When the bill reached the Senate, it was referred to the Finance Committee. That committee, after considering the same plans which had been studied by the Ways and Means Committee, adopted a modified Ruml-Carlson plan as a substitute for the House bill. When the measure reached the Senate floor, various alternative plans were again considered, but the Carlson plan, as modified, was the only one which commanded a majority vote in the Senate. Following is a list of the various plans considered by the Senate and the vote thereon:

Ellender amendment—no abatement of 1942 liability—defeated 21 to 57.

Connally amendment—Doughton No. 1 plan—defeated 29 to 50.

George amendment—75 percent Carlson plan—defeated 32 to 50.

O'Daniel amendment—withholding tax only—defeated 29 to 48.

Bankhead amendment — Robertson-Forand plan—defeated 27 to 52.

Finance committee amendment—Carlson-Ruml plan—carried 48 to 31.

On final passage, the Senate bill was agreed to by a vote of 49 to 30.

Upon the passage of the bill by the Senate, the Senate insisted upon its amendment and asked for a conference with the House. After the conference was agreed to, the Republican minority on the Ways and Means Committee sponsored a motion to instruct the conferees to agree to the Senate bill. Had not the President intervened by sending a letter to Chairman GEORGE and Chairman DOUGHTON urging the defeat of the Senate bill, there is no question but what our motion would have carried, and the people would have been given the Carlson-Ruml plan, which they overwhelmingly desire. The President's letter, however, had the effect of swaying enough votes to prevent our motion to instruct the conferees from being carried, and it was defeated 194 to 202.

The conference committee met for a week trying to arrive at an agreement. Although a majority of the Senate conferees favored the Carlson plan, it has not been possible to secure its adoption in conference since the majority members of the House conference group are definitely and unalterably opposed to it. The three Republican members of the conference consistently supported the Senate bill, embracing the Carlson plan, but without at least one vote from the Democratic side we were unable to command a majority vote. While our votes, coupled with those of the Senate members favoring the Carlson plan, represented a majority of the conference committee, the rules require the conferees on the part of each House to vote as a unit in accordance with the will of a majority.

With the threat of a Presidential veto being bandied around, the Senate Democratic conferees were anxious to compromise on something short of the Carlson plan. The House Democratic conferees had little to offer except the discredited Doughton No. 1 plan and the Robertson-Forand plan, neither of which were acceptable to the Republican minority members of the conference or to the Senate conferees. Finally, the Democratic House conferees proposed a 60-percent Carlson plan, but this, too, failed to receive our support or that of the Senate conferees.

The Senate conferees proposed as a compromise the so-called George plan, which had been offered in the Senate by Senator GEORGE. This, in effect, was a three-quarters Ruml-Carlson plan, since it abated 75 percent of the liability of the lower-income year, 1942 or 1943, in the case of all taxpayers. The House Democratic conferees were unyielding on this compromise proposal because of the amount of abatement involved, and the House Republican conferees were opposed to it in principle because of the fact that it involved some doubling up, which was the basis of our opposition to all substitute proposals for the Carlson plan.

The conference committee, as I have indicated, sat for a week without being able to arrive at any agreement. A deadlock was in prospect, with the result that there would be no legislation on the subject enacted into law. As a final compromise proposal, the Senate conferees offered a plan based on the George 75-percent proposal, but with 100-percent abatement of 1 year's liability where the tax was $50 or less. The plan also included the principle of the two antiwindfall provisions of the Carlson plan, limiting the abatement to the lower income of the 2 years, 1942–43, and excluding from the abatement smaller war profits.

It became evident that if any agreement was to be reached with the Senate, it would have to be on this proposal. I personally did not favor it because of the doubling-up feature, resulting from the carry-over of 25 percent of the past year's liability. I have felt all along that the Carlson plan was the only fair and practicable measure for accomplishing the transition to a current, pay-as-we-go basis of income-tax collection. But here we were, faced with the dilemma of either accepting the Senate compromise proposal or being responsible for the complete break-down of the conference and the collapse of the effort to at least substantially achieve the desirable and necessary tax reform which we had set out to accomplish. I felt that under the circumstances I must subordinate my own views on the subject and vote to accept the compromise proposal so that the pay-as-you-go system could be put into immediate effect and the transition to a fully current basis be accomplished within a reasonable time.

The 25 percent carry-over, which will be spread over a period of 2 years, will in effect amount to a 12½-percent increase in tax payments in 1944 and 1945. However, it is to be hoped that such increase will be in lieu of any increase in rates in connection with the President's request for $16,000,000,000 of additional revenue, since there is a limit to what the taxpayers can stand.

If the Carlson plan had been adopted, there would be no such doubling up. Except for the opposition of the administration, and the President's interference, the Carlson plan would undoubtedly have been adopted by the House after it had been passed by the Senate. The full responsibility for the increased liability under the conference agreement must therefore rest squarely on the shoulders of the administration. We of the Republican minority, both in the House and Senate, certainly did all we could to give the people the Carlson plan, and we regret that our efforts were not successful. So far as I am personally concerned, I want to say that while I signed the conference report, I did so only in order to get any legislation at all and not because I favor the compromise over the Carlson plan. I am still for the Carlson plan, but I realize that under the present circumstances there is no possibility of securing its enactment.

Following is a brief summary of the principal provisions of the conference agreement, and an outline of how it will apply in the case of the average taxpayer.

The bill as agreed to in conference provides for withholding at the source, commencing July 1. The withholding rate will be 20 percent, and will apply to wages and salaries in excess of the withholding exemptions, which are $624 annually for single persons, $1,248 annually for married persons, and $312 annually for each dependent. On a weekly basis the withholding-tax exemptions are $12 for single persons, $24 for married persons, and $6 for each dependent. On a monthly basis they are $52, $104, and $26, respectively.

If, for example, a married man earns $50 a week, his employer will withhold out of each pay envelope, commencing July 1, 20 percent of the excess of the weekly pay over the weekly exemption of $24 which is applicable in his case. Thus the withholding tax would be 20 percent of $26, or $5.20. This withholding tax will be credited against the current income-tax liability of the taxpayer. It is not an additional tax, but simply a means of collecting the personal income tax at the source as the income is earned. The withholding will only apply to wages and salaries, and in general will cover only those types of employment as are now affected by the Victory tax withholding. Thus it will not apply to agricultural labor, domestic servants or self-employed persons. The present Victory tax withholding will be absorbed in the 20 percent rate, which is intended to cover both the Victory tax liability and the first bracket liability under the regular income tax. Those whose tax for the year does not exceed the amount withheld at the source will have nothing more to pay. Those whose liability does exceed the amount withheld, and those who are not affected by the withholding, will pay their remaining or entire tax, as the case may be, in quarterly installments.

The tax paid March 15 of this year on account of the past year's liability will be credited against the current year's liability. The June 15 installment on last year's income must be paid in full, and it will also be credited to the current year's tax. Those who paid their tax in full on March 15 will not have to pay any September 15 or December 15 installment unless their income for 1943 is higher than for 1942. The withholding tax will be collected, however, and any overpayment will be refundable March 15, 1944.

On September 15, taxpayers will be required to file a return covering their estimated income for the year. At that time, they will take credit for the amounts paid on March 15 and June 15, and adjust their September 15 and December 15 installments accordingly. They will also take credit for the amount withheld out of their pay envelopes after July 1. On December 15 they may, if they desire, file an amended return showing an increased or decreased income over that previously estimated. The final return for the year will be filed March 15, 1944, at which time any necessary adjustments can be made, based on the actual income for the year, and the actual outlays for contributions, interest payments, and other deductions. On the same final return, taxpayers will show their estimated income for the ensuing year. Amended returns may be filed on any of the subsequent quarterly installment dates, if necessary.

In order to assure the filing of substantially correct estimates of income during the year, either on the original return or the amended returns, the bill provides that taxpayers must pay during the year at least 80 percent of the amount finally ascertained to be due for the year, or face an interest penalty of 6 percent of the amount by which the payments during the year fall short of 80 percent of the actual liability shown on the final return. In the case of farmers, only two-thirds of the final liability must be paid within the year to avoid the interest penalty, and they also are not required to file a return of estimated income until the last installment date, December 15.

The 1943 tax liability will be based on the higher income of the two years, 1942 or 1943, in the case of all taxpayers—except members of the armed forces, as hereafter explained. In order to prevent any undue doubling up of taxes as a result of the shift to a current collection basis, the conference report provides for the abatement of three-fourths of the liability for either the year 1942 or 1943, whichever is the lower. Where the amount of tax due in the lower year is $50 or less, the liability is completely forgiven, and there is no carry-over. On liabilities of between $50 and $66.67, there is a flat $50 abatement, and on liabilities over $66.67, the 75 percent abatement applies.

The unabated one-quarter of the tax for the lower of the two years will be collected in two installments, one of which is payable March 15, 1944, and the other on March 15, 1945. No interest will be charged. In effect, this carry-over amounts to a 12½ percent increase in tax payments during these two years, since it is added to the payments on account of the current liability for such years.

Those whose income in the abated year—1942 or 1943, whichever is lower—exceeds the highest income for 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940 by more than $20,000 will be subject to a special antiwindfall provision, the effect of which is to limit the abatement to so-called normal income and to prevent its application to swollen war profits. This would be accomplished by collecting as a windfall tax the difference between the 75-percent abatement of the tax for the lower of the 2 years, 1942 or 1943, and a tentative tax, computed at 1942 rates, on the total of the base year's income plus $20,000. For example, if the tax in the lower of the 2 years, 1942 or 1943, were $400,000—the approximate tax on an income of $500,000—there would be a provisional abatement of 75 percent, or $300,000, and the balance, or $100,000, would be carried forward and collected over the next 2 years in addition to current taxes. The $300,000 provisional abatement would then be compared with a hypothetical tax on the highest income for 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940, increased by $20,000. If the resulting hypothetical tax were equal to or greater than the amount provisionally abated—75 percent of the tax for the lower year, 1942 or 1943—no windfall tax would be assessed since no abnormal profits would be indicated. However, if this hypothetical tax on so-called normal income had amounted to only $100,000, then the abatement would be limited to this sum, and the difference between it and the $300,000 provisional abatement would be collected as a windfall tax. This windfall tax may be paid in four installments, at the option of the taxpayer, with interest at 4 percent, the first installment being due March 15, 1945.

In the above example, the taxpayer would owe the full tax for the highest income year, 1942 or 1943, plus one-quarter of the liability for the lower of the 2 years, plus the windfall tax.

The conference report includes three special provisions for members of the armed forces. First, there will be no increase in their 1943 tax on account of having had a higher income in 1942, insofar as such 1942 income was earned income, as distinguished from unearned or investment income. The first $3,000 of the 1942 income would be presumed to be earned in all cases, but no amount over $14,000 would be recognized as earned income. Thus if a soldier had a civilian salary of $10,000 in 1942 and a service income of $600 in 1943, his tax for 1943 would be based solely on his 1943 income and not his 1942 income, and there would be no carry-over of any part of the 1942 liability. In such case the 1943 tax would cover the full liability for the 2 years, except as the abatement provisions might be applicable. They require that the 1943 tax be increased by 25 percent of the tax for the lower year—1943—if it is in excess of $50, but since in the above example the soldier did not have sufficient income in 1943 to make him subject to tax he would have no liability either on account of 1942 or 1943.

The second provision in the interest of members of the armed forces is that which increased their exemption for income-tax purposes. They are permitted under the conference report to exclude from gross income the first $1,500 of their service pay, regardless of rank, and in addition will be entitled to the regular exemption of $500 for single persons, $1,200 for married persons, and $350 for each dependent.

The third provision relating to members of the armed forces would cancel any outstanding income-tax liability of such a person who dies while in active service.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may care to consume to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, this is sorry business, and every Member knows it.

This Ruml plan, from a practical standpoint, trades a big year of taxes for a bad year. It gives away the taxes for the most prosperous year of our history, and the Government takes the loss in the first bad year we come to. It is argued ingeniously we must "take the taxes out of the salary check." But this monstrosity forgives 75 percent, not only of the tax on salaries of workers, but it forgives 75 percent of taxes on capital gains, bond interest, dividends, real-estate profits, commissions, and like income. Besides being so flagrantly dishonest, it is cumbersome, a nuisance, and a constant annoyance.

I believe in the collection of taxes at the source, but not in the tossing away of revenue. A Congressman takes an oath to support the Constitution. He also has a duty to protect the revenues of his Government against private deceit and public clamor.

For these reasons and many others advanced in the RECORD I shall vote against the conference report.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am sorry, but I do not have the time.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. How are we going to get any information from the committee if they will not yield to anybody except to listen to them speak.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the distinguished gentleman had asked me to yield, I would have been glad to. He did not do me that honor.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I was afraid to ask the chief himself when I could not get anybody else to answer. I want some questions answered.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If the gentleman has read the report, which has been available for several days, it gives all the information at my disposal. I am sorry I do not have time to yield at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

TAXES AGAIN

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, this Ruml plan has about as many lives as an alley tomcat, and about as many morals. No matter how many times it is defeated it always bobs up again in a new guise. So here she is again, 25-percent reformed, and the Congress will take her to its manly bosom at a shotgun wedding and all will be forgiven—at least 75 percent of all will be forgiven, which is a pretty good average on sin in Washington.

This bill is not a tax bill at all, but merely a method of collecting taxes, or, rather, not collecting taxes. The President advises us and the country that we need $16,000,000,000 of additional revenue, so we spend 5 months in devising a plan to avoid additional revenue. Under this bill we forgive:

Three weeks pay to the average wage earner.

Two and one-half months pay to Members of Congress.

Four years' income after taxes to wealthy persons in the upper bracket income class.

Evidently tax forgiveness is being rationed and big business has the proper priorities with a 28-percent cut to Members of Congress.

Naturally, the question arises, How will we raise the extra $16,000,000,000? The answer is, by a Federal sales tax. For more than 30 years I have opposed the principle of the sales tax. I have felt, and still do, that it violates the fundamental principle of taxation—let the burden rest on those best able to pay. The sales tax reverses this principle and places the tax burden upon the food, clothing, and other necessities of those least able to carry the load. And yet the pious proponents of this new tax will say, "It is the only way to prevent inflation." My answer to that is this: No $50-a-week wage earner is buying $3.50 steaks in the swanky hotels and restaurants of Washington. Only those who have the money can afford the outrageous prices for food in our Capital City. It is not the Government employees, clerks, stenographers, mail carriers, and so on, who run up the price of food.

Speaking of food calls to mind the roll-back. One thing brings on another in this upside-down program. In order that we may keep down food prices to the consumer, and at the same time keep up production, we are going to pay subsidies. On June 1 there was a roll-back of 10 percent on the price of butter. Let us say that this roll-back will amount to 5 cents per pound. Under present restrictions that means 60 cents per year per person. The subsidy will be paid to the creameries and will cost the Government $90,000,000 annually. There will also be a roll-back of about 2 cents per pound on meat, and 2 cents per pound on coffee, and that will run about $350,000,000 per year. All of which will amount to less than $1 per month to the average American family on butter, meat, and coffee. To affect this saving, which means less than 1 cent a day to the consumer, it will cost the Government $450,000,000 annually. This means more taxes, and more taxes means more wages, and more wages means higher cost of living, and so the merry dance goes on, and no relief in sight.

The Congress vetoed the President's $25,000 ceiling on wages, which I felt was a mistake. The Congress again made a mistake on this tax bill. Both of these congressional acts aided big money. And the third mistake will be made when we pass a sales tax. All of these measures will work to the detriment of the average wage earner. The President made a mistake in not taking Mr. Bernard Baruch's advice on the first price-fixing bill, which Mr. Baruch said was no good and would not work. The results speak for themselves. It seems strange that we should not be realistic enough to face the facts and remedy them.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may care to consume to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I opposed the passage of this bill. I have voted against every one of these bills which have for their major purpose giving millions to those who already own millions at the expense of the smaller income taxpayers and the Treasury of the United States.

The bill is even worse than the bill which was passed by the House some days ago, known as the Robertson-Foran bill.

For instance, a married couple with an income of $3,000 is forgiven $324 under the House bill and only $243 under this bill.

A taxpayer with an income of $25,000 is forgiven $4,437 under the House bill and $6,915 under this bill.

Under the House bill a married taxpayer with an income of $1,000,000 is forgiven $189,750, while under this bill he is forgiven $640,500, and the larger the taxpayer the larger the increased amount of forgiveness on up to those in the millionaire class.

I paid my 1942 income tax on the 15th of last March. Now, why the Government should give me back 75 percent of my income tax for 1942, permitting me to use same as payment on my 1943 taxes, is beyond my comprehension, especially at this time, when we are called upon to vote billions almost weekly in connection with our war efforts, the greatest struggle ever in the history of the world.

In the first place, the Ruml proposal is, more or less, a real joke, as far as accomplishing what has been carried in the tremendous amount of propaganda in the press, through the mails, and over the radio, that is, "we are going to make taxpayers current, pay as you go."

The only class of taxpayers that could become current and pay as they go, based on what they actually know as to the amount they would have to pay, would be those taxpayers who do not have any income except a definite salary or wage income.

Where a taxpayer is engaged in other lines of business, for instance, farming, merchandising, banking, in fact, as stated, any line of business other than simply receiving a salary, the only thing that such a taxpayer could do under this bill would be to guess as to what amount such a taxpayer would have to pay, in that, certainly, this type of taxpayer would not, as stated, be in a position to know what amount of income tax he would have to pay until the end of the taxable year, at which time he would know the definite amount for which he would be liable.

For instance, take my farming operations. There is not a possible chance for me to know just what I am going to produce on my farm this year, and, certainly, I do not know what I am going to receive for the products I sell until after I have finished gathering and disposed of my farm products.

In the next place, there is no way of actually knowing about any losses which I may have on the farm which would be deductible until, as stated, at the end of the year, when I am in a position to get out a balance sheet, which would definitely indicate the amount of taxes that I am due.

This Ruml-tumble proposal originated in Wall Street, and I am sure when the people of the country wake up to just how Mr. Ruml is giving the humble a real tumble those who vote for this bill will have to do a considerable amount of explaining.

Mr. Speaker, I am inserting herewith a very interesting statement, which I am sure will be read with a great deal of interest by the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, giving information concerning the Ruml-tumble tax proposal:

BARELY ONE-HALF OF ALL INCOME TAXES AND INCOME TAXPAYERS ARE BROUGHT UNDER THE PAY-AS-YOU-GO-BEFORE-YOU-KNOW PLAN—ITS MECHANICS AND HOW IT WILL WORK

For the doctor, the lawyer, the statesman, with other occupation besides his statesmanship; for the 2,250,000 business units in the United States and for the tens of thousands of small manufacturers there will be more bookkeeping, more bother, more guesswork, uncertainty, and confusion than they have ever known before, if we adopt the pay-as-you-go bookkeeping and tax-paying plan. Even then we shall cover only about one-half of the taxes and one-half of the taxpayers.

When the plan is in full operation on March 15 of the pay-as-you-go-year, the guessing year, all taxpayers, except farmers and corporations, would file an estimated tax return, if it can reasonably be expected that their income will exceed $1,000. The pay-as-you-guess plan comes in here. Some of the taxpayers, about one-half, would have to guess for the remaining 8½ months of the year as to expenses, possible profits, interest, or dividends, raises or reductions in wages or salaries, contributions, depreciation allowances, the various reserves that might be deductible, in fact you would have to make a guess on all the multitude of factors that go into fixing your taxable income. Then you would have to keep guessing all through the balance of the year, because if your taxable income rises or falls below the estimate, then you might need to file amended returns on June 15, September 15, and December 15, (why not monthly if you are to have a true pay-as-you-go?) and increase or decrease your installments accordingly.

To keep you out of the pay-when-you-know class, back into which all people normally endeavor to go, you had better not make any mistakes in your guesses.

One bill before Congress provides that if you do not guess right as to at least 80 percent of the total actual liability shown on the final return, then there would be assessed a penalty amounting to 6 percent of the amount by which the actual tax exceeds the estimate.

This threat has to be applied to keep people from falling back into the normal post-your-books-when - you - know - the - entries, pay-what-you-owe-when-you-know methods.

One can see what a blur of confusions, explanations, apologies, noncompliances and dissatisfaction will arise from these pay-by-guess-bookkeeping, taxpaying methods. The final and probably chief amount of these taxes will be paid on the pay-when-you-know method anyway.

After the March 15 report of the pay-when-you-know year, there comes the reviewing agent in the following year. This reviewing agent (or now agents) would check the final pay-when-you-know report. He would also have to go over the guesses of the pay-as-you-go year. There lies a possible appeal to the conference committee, when all reports and penalties may again be reviewed and assessed.

Assume that a pay-as-you-guess bill is enacted, will all taxes and all taxpayers come under it?

Decidedly no!

A. The farmer would get away with December 15 figures. In other words, he remains on a shortened, confused pay-when-you-know basis. There are between 50 and 60 million of them. They will neglect these rules. Will it make sense to file a report on December 15, and then file another one 3 months later?

B. Corporations are left on the pay-when-you-know basis. There are about 4,000 of them.

But the A and B groups—farmers and corporations—number nearly one-half of the taxpayers and pay nearly one-half of the Federal income taxes.

We are asked to stand for all this capricious system of exemptions, guesses, penalties, and "checkoffs", adding thus to the general odiousness of such income-tax imposts.

For what reason or reasons? Unquestionably the most potent one back of this movement is to get 2 years' taxes into 1, so that the rather sordid argument may have force that the burden is too great. Hence the taxes for one of these years must be forgiven, and that in the midst of this exacting, exhausting life and death struggle, this war.

"The forego and forget." The taxes which are proposed to be rebated are now an actual asset exactly as much in existence and belonging to the Government and the people as if they were cash in the Treasury. If the Government wanted to cash in on these taxes, and the people were not being misled by promises of forgetting and foregoing for a small discount the Government could in a month or two at the outside put these $10,000,000,000 in the Treasury of the United States. Why, then, should this asset be wiped out in these days of dire National need?

Should the pay-as-you-guess or pay-before-you-know bookkeeping and taxpaying plan be adopted, the following forecast will probably prove correct.

After the sinister rebate is consummated we would in practice and soon no doubt by law slide back into the only sensible way of keeping our books and paying our taxes, the pay-when-you-know-what-you-owe way and (it is to be hoped) in four installments again.

Congress will lift the 6 percent penalty or other penalties. In the first stage it may even put taxpayers all on the former basis December 15. The individual taxpayer will farcically guess low on the pay-before-you-know March 15 year. He will make his books up and pay the bulk of his taxes when he knows what he owes.

"Check-offs" by the busy taxpayers for the Government will be dropped too.

A famous author says:

"Man stumbles and falls backward by imposing upon himself the intolerable burden of governmental paper work."

Do not substitute pay as you go by guess, leaving out half of the taxpayers and half of the taxes (corporations and farmers) nor introduce the governmental "check-off" with all its evils and, for such a bad bargain, throw in $10,000,000,000 of sound national assets to boot.

But rather pay when you know what you owe.

Be thankful for four installments.

In this time of national dire need pay all you owe.

As to the Government "check-off," trust more to the sporting spirit as well as the business honesty and sense of American taxpayers that in these days they will keep their books and pay their taxes as they should.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. FOLGER].

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I realize the situation in which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee is placed. I would go with him anywhere, but I am not in the same embarrassing situation he is. I regard this bill as it comes back by way of a conference report to the House as economically unsound and morally wrong, and I cannot support it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GORE). The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DEWEY].

Mr. DEWEY. Mr. Speaker, one of my fellow members of the Ways and Means Committee said it would be a sorry spectacle if this bill should pass. I think it would be a sorry spectacle if this Congress did not answer the demand of the American people to get on a pay-as-you-go tax basis. They are asking for that.

As we all know, there are two means of accomplishment. You can pay 2 years' taxes in 1 year. That is almost impossible. You can pay parts of 2 years in 1 year, and that is somewhat possible. It will be a great burden, no matter how it is levied, owing to the high rates of taxes that are now necessary to support our war effort.

This conference report does a good job in making the transition to a pay-as-you-go system as easy as possible. It does another thing. It also makes it possible not to have to write new rates for personal income taxes in 1943. Of course, there is no guaranty that they will not be raised, but by spreading the unforgiven 25 percent of the lower year, at least $1,225,000,000 will be raised. If that sum is added to the admitted revenue increase of $3,000,000,000, due to the increase of national income, the revenue will be $4,225,000,000 more in fiscal year 1944 than it would be if we did not pass the bill.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWEY. I will yield in just 1 minute, if you please.

What the people want is to get on a pay-as-you-go basis. In addition, the people want to know what will be the tax rates during the ensuing year, and not fear that new rates written in the fall of 1943, will be made retroactive to January 1, 1943. This bill will make everyone current by March 15, 1945, and it will place the least burden on all. It is not giving away the Treasury. It is acting fairly with all taxpayers in proportion to the amount they have been paying in taxes.

I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina for a question.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Can the gentleman tell us how, if we adopt this pay-as-you-go plan and then should not be satisfied with it and want to go back to paying our taxes as we always have done for the preceding year, how can we do it with no year to substitute?

Mr. DEWEY. In 1945 Congress could change to the old system if it wished to.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. How?

Mr. DEWEY. I only have 5 minutes and I cannot enter into a long argument on writing a new tax bill for the gentleman. I am discussing the bill that is before us and I cannot yield any further.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWEY. I cannot yield further. I would like to say in closing, the Ways and Means Committee has struggled for 4 months.

The accusation that there has been any favoritism shown either to large or small taxpayers is unfair and unjust. The compromise bill before us is the only means of getting on a pay-as-you-go basis and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people demand that of us and demand a current tax bill at the same time.

I hope that the House will vote for the bill brought to them by the committee of conference.

Mr. Speaker, I yeld back the balance of my time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCLEAN].

Mr. MCLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the conference report. It does not accomplish all that we started out to do in making necessary improvements in our income-tax collection system, but it is a step in the right direction. It will make possible in not more than 2 years the collection of all income taxes out of current income. Meanwhile at least 75 percent of the income taxes will be collected on a pay-as-you-earn basis. The flow of income to the Treasury will not be diminished but will be greater than under present law.

The consideration of this matter has taken an unnecessarily long time. The delay has been due to the effort of the Treasury Department to obtain larger amounts of tax from persons whose taxes are already so high that, measured by the ability to pay, additional taxes could not be collected by increased rates. Had it not been for this effort, there would have been slight resistance to the suggestion for the abatement of the tax on 1 year's income. Every suggestion made for the solution of the problem recognized the necessity for some element of abatement. The difference in the several plans was only as to the amount and the classes of persons who would be affected thereby.

Because of the need to gain additional revenue and the virtual impossibility of increasing the income taxes, except from new taxpayers, the Treasury Department sought by overlapping to use what should have been an administrative measure as a revenue bill. The effort has succeeded in its purpose to the extent of the revenue which the bill will produce. The bill provides that the base for the 1943 taxes shall be the amount due for 1942 or 1943—whichever is the greater. The tax on the lesser of the two will be abated to the extent of 75 percent, and the balance will be payable over a period of 2 years. It is estimated that by these processes the flow of income to the Treasury will be increased in 1943, and will increase the amount which the taxpayers will be required to pay in 1944 and 1945. This is tantamount to an increase in income-tax rates. Such rates are approaching—if they have not already reached—all that the traffic will bear, and, therefore, there should be no consideration given in the immediate future to the increase in the rates of taxes on incomes.

I favored a simpler process. The difficulty presenting itself came as the result of an error that was made in the tax law of 1913 when the income tax was first adopted. The tax covering incomes earned in the year 1913 was made payable during the year 1914. At that time and until recently the taxpayers were few, the rates were low, and the persons liable for the tax were of a class who always had the ability to pay. With the increase in expenditures of the Federal Government, it became necessary to provide additional revenue. The number of taxpayers and the rates of tax were considerably increased. Many liable for the tax will not have the ability to pay unless the tax can be collected out of current income. The error of 1913 has become a serious matter. The income tax of today is entirely different from that of 1913 both in the quantum of the tax and the number and type of people who have been brought into the taxpayers' fold. Old methods of collection have become obsolete. A new and modern method of collection must be applied so that payment can be made out of current income.

The case of the new taxpayer creates no difficulty, but taxpayers already on the rolls are making the payment of the tax on their previous year's income out of the income of the subsequent year and at the same time accumulating a tax liability payable in the following year. To require them to make payment of their tax on their current income out of current earnings results in the payment of 2 years' taxes in 1.

I favored the simple method of abatement of the tax on the income of 1 year and a fresh start on a modern method of collecting income taxes on a pay-as-you-earn basis. Experience has demonstrated that the date of payment of income taxes may be so far removed from the earning period that the taxpayer may have dissipated his income and be without the ability to pay on the date when the payment becomes due. The application of this principle requires that income taxes be paid out of current income.

The plan for the 100-percent application of this principle received a substantial vote in the House of Representatives on two occasions. It was recognized to some extent by the bill which passed the House. The compromise which comes from the conference committee and is now before us recognizes the principle and makes it possible to bring about the payment of income taxes on a pay-as-you-earn basis in a comparatively short time.

I am still of the opinion that the 100-percent application of the principle would have been better. It would have simplified matters for the Treasury Department, with resulting economy in administration. Much of the amount anticipated will not be collected due to the vicissitudes of life and business, and the anticipated revenue will be reduced by these losses and the cost of collection of the amount realized. There is bound to be a considerable amount of uncertainty and confusion added to the unpopularity of the tax, which always results in greater difficulty in collection.

However, I believe that the step we are about to take is in the right direction. It will ultimately correct a serious flaw in our income-tax system. It will protect the revenue for all time, and it will provide additional revenue which would otherwise have to be found by increasing taxes on personal incomes.

There will be some complaint as to the complete abatement of the taxes amounting to $50 or less. That provision merely recognizes the fact that the costs of collection would exceed the amount realized. That is merely good business, eliminating what amounts to nuisance taxes so far as the Government is concerned. The American people will applaud the provisions which will prevent any advantage to those who are making large profits out of war contracts, and the generous treatment of the tax liability of those who have left everything behind them and are now in the service of their country in the four corners of the earth.

I am satisfied that the plans outlined in the conference report afford the best solution of the difficult problem that it is possible to agree upon.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the debate on the so-called Ruml-Carlson plan I announced that I was opposed to any forgiveness or any compulsory doubling up.

As the conference committee bill contains both of these vices I must oppose and will, at the proper time, vote against the adoption of the conference committee's report.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that today—after 5 months of deliberation—the House will approve the conference report on pay-as-you-go tax legislation.

Generally speaking, no compromise can be wholly satisfactory to everyone. This conference agreement is no exception. I think it is time that we resolve some of our personal views into legislative language and give our Nation current income-tax collections. The House of Representatives and Congress must demonstrate to the people of our Nation that we can legislate.

The conference agreement that we are considering today is the final result of very divergent views on changing our method of income-tax collections. We have been traveling in the same rut for so long that it is very difficult to open up a new trail. Those of us who have been working hard to secure early approval of this legislation fully realize its problems and complexities.

There is no doubt in my mind but what the pending conference agreement will call for future revision. It is on that basis that I am giving my consent and approval to it today.

I realize the great burden that is being placed on employers for the collection of this tax. If it were not for the fact that our Nation is at war and that our personal income taxpayers have increased in number from 3,900,000 in 1940 to 44,000,000 in 1943 I would not have encouraged the enactment of this type of legislation. I do feel, however, that it is just as essential to make improvements in the collection of our income tax as it is to change rates and exemptions according to the national income and need for revenue.

When the present bill becomes a law it will completely change the method of income tax collections that has been largely in effect since 1914. It is a forward step and one that I believe must be taken. It had been my hope that Congress would approve legislation that would place personal income taxpayers on a fully current basis as of January 1, 1943, with no doubling up. Unfortunately the House did not accept my views and as a result most of our personal income taxpayers will be saddled with a 25 percent increase in their tax. They will not become current until they have paid the 25 percent increase which will be due at the rate of 12½ percent on March 15, 1944, and 12½ percent on March 15, 1945. It had been my hope we could make this transition from the present year-behind collection system to a current collection system without using the bill as a means to increase taxes. While the conference committee did not accept my proposal in whole, they did accept it in principle by the abatement of at least 75 percent of 1 year's liability for all taxpayers.

There has been much contention about the abatement or forgiveness of taxes. The word forgiveness was a cleverly coined word used to defeat pay-as-you-go tax legislation. Everyone who is familiar with taxes and studies this proposal knows there is no forgiveness of individual income taxes until the taxpayer's income declines or ceases. It is my contention that an individual's income tax should be reduced when his income declines. It is more evident that we should not collect income taxes for the preceding year from an individual after his death. The purpose of the legislation under discussion is to remove the income tax debt liability and place our income taxpayers on a current basis.

It is with some regret that I find the provision of the conference report requiring the 1943 tax to be based on the higher income of the 2 years 1942 or 1943 is not limited to those with incomes over $5,000, as provided in my bill. It is my thought that all taxpayers whose income is less than $5,000 should not have to pay on the higher income of the 2 years, but on their current 1943 liability. This was one provision of my bill that would have been of great benefit to men in the service, farmers, small businessmen, and laboring people.

The present bill by requiring the taxpayer to pay his income on the higher of 1942 or 1943 income will work a real hardship on a large number of our citizens whose income will be greatly reduced in 1943 through no fault of their own. It will be a real hardship on those farmers who reside in the flood-stricken areas of the central United States. This situation will be equally true for farmers living in areas where last year they produced the first paying crop in years and this year, because of the elements, may produce a very small crop. It will also mean a real problem for the thousands of small businessmen who had a small income in 1942 but are gradually being forced out of business in 1943. Not only will these taxpayers whose income was greatly reduced have to pay the tax on the higher year, they will in addition thereto have to pay an increase of 25 percent of the tax for the lower year spread over the 2-year period.

When this bill becomes a law the day of levying personal income taxes retroactively will be passed. No more will Congress be criticized for approving income-tax legislation retroactively to January 1 after 9 or 10 months of the year have gone by. This was the situation we found ourselves in following enactment of the 1942 Revenue Act. It was not only unfair to the individual taxpayers, but it is an out-dated manner of levying taxes.

When our individual taxpayers are on a current basis Congress can enact tax legislation changing the exemptions or rates and place them in effect with a minimum of disturbance to the taxpayer. His taxes will be paid out of current income on the basis of the income he receives, not out of current income on the basis of last year's tax liability. This feature alone is highly desirable in our income-tax law and should meet the approval of Congress and the taxpayer. As I stated earlier in my remarks, I am confident there will be many inequalities and many hardship cases develop under existing legislation.

As one Member of this Congress I want to assure the American people that when these inequities arise that it will be my desire to assist in correcting them as far as practicable and necessary in future tax legislation.

ANTIWINDFALL PROVISIONS

The conference agreement adopts the principle of the two antiwindfall provisions which were contained in my bill, but with certain modifications.

The first antiwindfall provision of my bill would have required taxpayers with over $5,000 taxable income in 1942 to pay a 1943 tax based on the higher income of the 2 years, and the tax for the lower of the 2 years would have been abated. Under the conference agreement, this provision is made applicable to all taxpayers, regardless of the size of the income, except that there are special provisions in the case of servicemen, which I will explain later. In other words, if the conference report is adopted, all taxpayers will pay a 1943 tax based on the higher of the 2 years, 1942 or 1943, and the 75 percent abatement will apply to the lower of the 2 years.

For example, if a man's tax for 1942 was $100, and his tax for 1943 was $200, this provision would not apply. He would simply be forgiven $75 of his 1942 tax, and the remaining $25 would be carried forward and paid in addition to current taxes, one-half being due and payable March 15, 1944, and one-half March 15, 1945.

On the other hand, if his tax liability for 1942 was $200, and his tax on 1943 income was $100, the final 1943 tax would be based on the higher 1942 liability. What actually happens is that the 1943 tax of $100 is increased by the difference between it and the higher 1942 tax, which means that there would be an additional liability of $100, making a total tax for 1943 of $200 instead of $100. The result is substantially the same as taxing 1942 income instead of 1943 income.

The 75 percent abatement then applies to the lower tax year, 1943, and the 25 percent carry-over is based on the 1943 tax before being increased because of the higher 1942 liability. In other words, the carry-over is 25 percent of $100, not of $200. The unabated $25 would be payable one-half on March 15, 1944, and one-half March 15, 1945.

An exception to this rule requiring the 1943 tax to be based on the higher income of the 2 years, 1942 and 1943, is made in the case of persons in the armed service. There will be no addition to their 1943 tax because of having a higher income in 1942, insofar as the 1942 income was earned income not in excess of $14,000. In other words, if a soldier had a $3,000 civilian salary in 1942, and $600 Army pay in 1943, his 1943 tax liability would be based solely on his service income, and on that amount there would of course be no tax in view of the liberal exemption for members of the armed forces. In effect, the 1942 tax liability would be completely wiped out in his case. The 75-percent abatement provision would apply to the lower income of the 2 years, which means that the 25-percent carry-over would be based on the 1943 tax, which would be zero, since in the case cited there would be no 1943 liability. As a practical matter, this relief provision for members of the armed forces will result in the abatement of 100 percent of their 1942 liability in all cases where the income was earned income not in excess of $14,000.

The second antiwindfall provision of the conference agreement is also based in principle upon the similar provision of my bill, but again substantial modifications have been made. This second antiwindfall provision is designed to prevent the 75 percent abatement provision from applying to that portion of the income of the abated year which represents swollen war profits. In other words, the intention is to limit the abatement to normal income.

Under my substitute proposal as amended on the House floor, the income of the abated year was compared with the base year 1940, and if it exceeded the base year's income by more than $5,000 the excess was subjected to the regular normal and surtax rates. In other words, the 1940 income, plus $5,000, was used as a yardstick in measuring the extent of the swollen war income in the year which would otherwise be abated. Such war profits were taxed in full, and the abatement thus limited to the normal portion of the income.

Under the conference agreement, a somewhat different method of taxing the war profit windfall is used. In the first place, instead of using the year 1940 as the base year, the conference report permits taxpayers to use the highest year of the years 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940. Secondly, the conference agreement allows an increase of up to $20,000, instead of $5,000, before the windfall tax applies. In the third place, the conference agreement, instead of setting off the income in the base year against the income in the abated year to measure the windfall, sets off a hypothetical tax on the total of the base year's income plus $20,000 against 75 percent of the tax of the abated year. In other words, it compares tax with tax, instead of income with income. In some cases this method may have the effect of subjecting the so-called windfall to a higher rate of tax than under the method provided in my bill, but this is somewhat offset by adding $20,000 to the base year's income instead of only $5,000.

The second antiwindfall provision of the conference agreement would work out in this fashion: Assume that the taxpayer had an income of $1,000,000 in 1943, $500,000 in 1942, and $80,000 in the highest base year. On his 1943 income he would pay a tax, including net Victory tax, of approximately $900,000. His 1942 liability, based on the $500,000 income, was approximately $400,000, and being the lower of the 2 years, the 75-percent abatement would apply to this amount. Twenty-five percent of the $400,000 tax, or $100,000, would be carried forward and collected, in addition to current taxes. One half, or $50,000, would be payable March 15, 1944, and the remainder March 15, 1945. The 75-percent abatement, amounting to $300,000, is then compared with a hypothetical tax, computed at 1942 rates, on the base year's income of $80,000, plus $20,000, making a total of $100,000. The hypothetical tax on this amount would be approximately $64,000. This is the norm, or yardstick, to be used in measuring the amount of so-called windfall in the 75-percent abatement, and represents the tax on normal profits. The excess of the 75-percent abatement of $300,000 over this $64,000 is the amount of the windfall tax. Thus, the abatement would be limited to $64,000 instead of $300,000, and the $236,000 difference would be regarded as a windfall, and would be collected as a windfall tax. It may be paid in four installments, commencing March 15, 1945, with interest at 4 percent.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means or to any member of that committee who may be able to answer it: Under this conference report what happens to a man who has gone into the service? Let us assume his income in 1942 was $20,000 but that he is now in the service at $50 a month: Is he forgiven the tax on the lesser of the 2 years or just what happens to him and how are you providing for a solution of his tax problem?

Mr. DOUGHTON. He is forgiven the tax on the greater of the 2 years to the extent that the tax on that year's income is attributable to earned income.

Mr. POWERS. In other words, if he is making $50 a month, does he have to pay a tax on what he earned in 1942?

Mr. DOUGHTON. He is forgiven all of that part of his tax for 1942 attributable to earned income.

Mr. POWERS. Are we to understand that if he in 1942 had a tax of $1,000 to pay, but that in 1943 he made only $50 a month, he would be paying out more than he made?

Mr. DOUGHTON. He would not have to pay the $1,000 if the income on which the tax was levied was earned income.

Mr. POWERS. In other words, under this bill he would be paying more tax in 1943 than his total earnings.

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; nothing like that.

Mr. POWERS. If a man made $20,000 in 1942 and made $600 in 1943 he would be paying more tax in 1943 than the money he made.

Mr. DOUGHTON. His 1942 tax would be forgiven to the extent it resulted from earned income. If his income for 1943 was only $600, he would probably have no tax to pay.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not suit me. It contains too much forgiveness and abatement in the higher incomes to suit me. I do feel the taxpayers of this country should be permitted to go on a current basis if they want to do so.

I am supporting the conference report because of the assurance of the committee that this legislation will provide additional revenue for the year to the extent of between three and four billion dollars and the further assurance that large profits created by reason of war contracts will not escape taxation and that such profits are protected by the windfall provisions of the bill.

I have always held to the opinion, as I do now, that this is not a time when taxes, especially on larger incomes, should be forgiven, reduced, or abated. It ought to be clearly understood that this is not a tax bill and that the primary reason for such legislation is to permit taxpayers to go on a current or pay-as-you-go plan or basis. In fact, that is the only real excuse for its consideration. I think it is extremely unfortunate that the great Ways and Means Committee of the House should have been required to spend so much of its time and energy in giving consideration to the matter of pay-as-you-go legislation instead of giving consideration to the question of meeting the ever-increasing obligations of our Government created by the war effort.

According to figures that have been submitted, we are going to spend about $80,000,000,000 this year and $144,000,000,000 next year. Under present circumstances our legislation will provide for raising about one-third of the amount we are spending. Somehow, somewhere, consideration is going to have to be given pretty soon to the problem of meeting the payment of at least a greater portion of this mounting debt. So I say the question of more importance in my judgment is the problem of raising further revenue to meet the obligations that are being created every day. The average American citizen has just about as much tax burden as he can carry, and the question of finding a new source of taxation is going to be a more difficult problem for this Congress than any Congress has had to meet in our history. Nevertheless, the Ways and Means Committee has the responsibility of presenting a plan as to how this dilemma is to be solved. This is a responsibility the Ways and Means Committee and this Congress must assume in the very near future.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, it is a very unfortunate situation that confronts us today. We do not have enough time to give this important matter proper consideration. The rules controlling conferences and the reports of conferees do not admit of proper consideration and I am in favor of amending them. I think they should be amended, and I have openly favored this for years. Here we come in today about to finish up an important matter that we have worked on for months and a matter that the country has been thinking about for months. Groups in the country have been tremendously interested in it for months; yet we are called upon to dispose of it finally in 1 short hour—30 minutes on each side. In the case before us no speaker has an adequate chance to explain the differences that the conference committee has made in these bills. As you probably realize, a conference committee has wide latitude. The fact of the matter is, as I have already stated, the conference committee has too much latitude, I think. As you know, the House passed a new bill, the Senate passed a different bill; the conference committee considers both bills and it brings out a bill that is different from either. It is a situation that ought to be remedied, but I do not know how we can do it. There is not much we can do about it today. We must act on what is before us.

Let us consider for a minute the parliamentary situation that we are going to find facing us in a few minutes. We are going to be called upon to vote. On what? We are going to vote on whether or not you shall accept this conference report. Suppose you do not accept it? What will be the result? Or, let me put it the other way: Suppose you do accept it. If you accept it by a majority vote, then we are through with this troublesome question. We shall have passed it, and it then goes to the Senate and, when it is considered and if they pass it, will then be up to the White House. What the President may do with it I cannot say and have not the temerity or, some might think, the audacity to even prophesy. But something is going to be done. If we do not vote for it, if we vote it down, we shall find ourselves exactly where we started with this difference: Somebody can make a motion to recede and concur or somebody can make a motion to instruct the conferees and send this conference report back with instructions.

What good will that do? The country is demanding action. In fact, the country is tired of our failure to function. Mr. Speaker, it would appear to me that the only thing that we can do, the only sensible thing we can do, is to adopt this conference report.

What is the matter with the conference report? One of the Members, speaking briefly this afternoon, said, "It is the Ruml plan over and over," and he is against the conference report, because he thinks it is the Ruml plan. Another favors it because he thinks it is not the Ruml plan. It is not the Ruml plan at all, and it cannot be truthfully said that it is the Ruml plan. The only feature of it that is a part of the original Ruml plan is the withholding at the source feature. Let us see what kind of a plan it is. What does it do? Let us just consider it fairly and lay aside any political considerations. Let us see what it does and determine whether or not it is a rich man's bill, as has been suggested.

Here is the first important feature: It provides that the taxpayer must pay on whichever is the larger, the 1942 or 1943 income. He has got to pay on the larger one of those 2 years, and that will be, in most cases, 1943, but if 1942 is larger he will be compelled to take 1942. Everybody gets the same consideration. There is no preference to the rich man as against the poor man there.

Let us take the next step. The next step is absolutely a step for the poor man. Let me figure with you for just a minute. Every man whose tax is less than $50 is forgiven his 1942 tax. Of course he pays his 1943 tax. We are all going to pay our 1943 tax if our 1943 income is higher than our 1942 income. If 1943 is lower, then the contrary, if we elect to do so. But assuming we are going to pay 1943, let us then consider how much of the 1942 tax will be forgiven.

When a taxpayer's tax is found to be $50 or lower, it is forgiven him entirely. He, therefore, gets a 100-percent reduction. That is fair to everybody in that group. There is no grab about that. Everybody gets the same treatment.

Now, suppose his tax is more than $50. Then he gets a reduction of 75 percent, and that applies to everybody from the $50 man up to the million-dollar man. They all get a 75-percent reduction. How did that come into this conference report? It came into it because the Democratic Senators in conference from the beginning steadfastly maintained that they must have a law that will play straight across the board, a 75-percent reduction to everybody straight across the board. And I want to appeal to you on the Democratic side as to whether that has not an appeal as being fair. It is a total 100-percent reduction to the man with a tax under $50 and a 75-percent reduction to everybody above that.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another provision in this bill that stops the rich man. What is it? It is the windfall provision. Nobody has discussed that with you yet this afternoon.

What is the windfall provision? Let us suppose a man makes a million dollars in 1943 and makes a half-million dollars in 1942. He must pay 1943 in full. He is entitled to a 75 percent forgiveness across the board as all other taxpayers but he does not actually get all that 75-percent reduction. He is subjected to a windfall tax if in fact he has had a windfall. This is determined by searching his income for the years 1937, 1938, 1939, and 1940. If it appears that his income in the highest of these 4 years, plus $20,000, is less than the forgiven portion of his 1942 income, he must pay a windfall tax. For instance, suppose in the above case that man who had an income of $1,000,000 in 1943 and $500,000 in 1942, only had an income of $50,000 in 1937, 1938, and 1939 and an income of $75,000 in 1940 there would be a wide margin of many thousands of dollars between his 1940 income and his 1942 income which would be subject to the regular income tax. I cannot here give you the details of this setup, but it is sufficient to say that the windfall taxes will bring many millions of additional taxes into the Treasury and that these millions will all come from the rich or heavy incomes.

Now, here we are. We take the little man and we give him a $50 credit and we take the big man and every other man and we give him 75 percent but if he made a large amount of profit in 1942 he has to pay on that inordinate income.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman cannot dispute that. No; I cannot yield, as my time is very limited.

Mr. DINGELL. No, he pays it over 2 years.

Mr. FORAND. Will the gentleman yield? I dispute what the gentleman says.

Mr. JENKINS. I did not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman from Massachusetts a few moments ago said this bill was the same as the Ruml plan. Why should I yield to the gentleman to make a statement such as that when the gentleman knows that is not true.

Mr. FORAND. If the gentleman will give me a chance I will prove it.

Mr. JENKINS. No; the gentleman cannot prove it, and why persist in making such an unfounded claim? If he can prove it, he should do so in his own remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely pleased with this report. I never was very much for the original Ruml plan. In fact the original Ruml plan was never considered on the floor of the House for his plan was not in legislative form. I favored the Carlson plan, which took some of the basic Ruml ideas and built up a very complete plan; the people were for the Carlson plan and I favored it. I have never been very much for a withholding tax that only withholds from certain groups. I am not in favor of a withholding tax that withholds from the working man unless we make it current and forgive him a portion if not all of the 1942 tax. To withhold and double up taxes at the same time is too much of a burden to the working man and to almost all of our other classes of citizens.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the conference report on which we will vote today fully meets every dictionary definition of the term "compromise." According to the dictionary, a compromise is "a settlement by which each party concedes or gives up something"; or it is "a combination of two opposite systems, made by sacrifice on the part of each." It necessarily follows that no compromise is ever fully satisfactory to any of the conflicting parties. The most that can usually be said of a compromise is that the compromise settlement is better than no settlement at all. And that is the most I can say in favor of this conference report.

When the tax bill was sent to conference and the Speaker had named the managers on the part of the House, and the President of the Senate those on the part of the Senate, I fully realized that in that entire body of 14 legislators there was not a single one who had previously said the bill passed by the House was his first choice. On the part of the Senate conferees there was only one who was even willing to accept the House bill. However, every Democrat of the House conferees loyally voted for the House bill on the three or four occasions it was offered in conference.

With a full realization of the problem confronting the House conferees and feeling that a compromise would be better than no bill at all, I addressed the following letter to the gentleman from North Carolina, Chairman DOUGHTON, on the day before the conferees met:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I send this letter to confirm what I have personally told you, namely, that I intend to support the conference report you bring back to the House on the pending tax bill. I am far more interested in seeing collection at the source of at least the basic tax liability commenced by July 1 than I am in seeing the forgiveness plan suggested by me written into law.

The withholding plan in the Senate bill is an improvement over that in the House plan and, therefore, I hope that will be adopted. In the House on yesterday I gave some of the reasons why I did not think the forgiveness plan of the Senate bill should be adopted. However, I am convinced that no conference report that does not provide some method of making a substantial number of taxpayers current within a reasonable time will be adopted by either the House or Senate. A program to make taxpayers current will not reach the desired goal if postponed until after the war. We naturally hope the war will not last more than 2 years longer.

On numerous occasions, in the committee and elsewhere, I have expressed the view that while increases in income taxes were unavoidable I did not think those increases should be made retroactive. That was my principal objection to all plans requiring a doubling up since one-half of the current calendar year will be gone before the new bill can become effective. One virtue of the bill passed by the House was that it required no doubling up, leaving open the question of increased rates for a subsequent bill to be applied to 1944 income. The House bill automatically makes 90 percent of the taxpayers current in 1943 and to all intent and purposes 96 percent, as the maximum increase on the net income of $5,000 of a married man with no dependents would be only 1.1 percent. Three hundred and thirteen Members of the House have voted for that plan and 27 Members of the Senate. There were 4 Members of the Senate paired for it.

There are two valid objections to the House bill. First, it forgives, after making allowance for the abatement of taxes to those in military service, something over $7,000,000,000 of 1942 liability, but the alternative to that, if we are to make taxpayers current, is a doubling up that amounts to a retroactive increase in rates. The second objection is that from a dollar standpoint it confers a greater benefit upon 90 percent of the taxpayers than upon the remaining 10 percent. The alternative to that is to confer a greater benefit in dollars upon the 10 percent than upon the remaining 90 percent. The alleged inequalities of treatment in the House bill is the lesser of the two inequalities. The President will accept the House bill and he may not accept the Senate bill. The House bill will be acceptable to 96 percent of the taxpayers. The percentage of opposition in the Senate to the Senate bill was greater than the percentage of opposition in the House to the House bill.

A conference report differing from any plan heretofore proposed is apt to engender considerable debate in both House and Senate. But, as I first indicated, you can count on my support of the conference action.

I quote this letter at this time for two reasons: In the first place, I wish the official record to show I have never wavered in the personal belief that the plan I first proposed to the Ways and Means Committee and which was finally adopted by the House was the best solution of a difficult problem. Secondly, I quote it to indicate my previous promise to accept the conference report made at a time when I did not know what the report would be. When I make a promise I carry it out when it is in my power to do so.

No one realized better than the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that in breaking the deadlock and making a tax bill possible he was agreeing to a compromise of "two opposite systems, made by sacrifice on the part of each." He sacrifices his opposition to the windfalls inherent in the Ruml plan because this conference report retains about 75 percent of them, in return for the inauguration by July 1 of collection of the basic tax liability against wages and salaries at the source, and for the advantages to accrue from speeding up for the fiscal year of 1944 the collection of income-tax liability by the sum of between two and three billion dollars. It was not an easy decision for him to make, but in making it he was 100 percent sincere in the belief that the action then taken was for the best interests of the country. I predict that when the roll is called on this conference report a majority on both sides of the aisle will not only pay tribute to that sincerity, but likewise to the wisdom of the decision made.

In voting for the conference report I will at least have the personal satisfaction that the 20-percent-withholding plan I proposed to the Ways and Means Committee will be written into law, and likewise that the supporters of the Ruml plan in both House and Senate were forced to make major concessions on the subject of windfalls by reason of the fight made in the House to limit the waiver of 1942 tax liability to the corresponding number of tax units to be collected at the source.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker being in doubt, the House proceeded to divide.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman permitted to ask for the yeas and nays during the time the vote is in progress?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 159, noes 68.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 257, nays 114, answered "present" 1, not voting 60, as follows:

There was no objection.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF WOMANHOOD

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, in this time of stress, when manpower is needed and every nerve and resource of the Nation is being put to the test, it is indeed gratifying to realize the wonderful contributions that the womanhood of the country is making toward our war effort.

Today in the city of Washington there is being entertained a young lady, Miss Vera Anderson, of Pascagoula, Miss., who is the champion woman welder of the world. As an employee of the Ingalls Shipbuilding Corporation of my home town of Pascagoula, Miss., Miss Anderson in competition with a representative of the Kaiser Shipbuilding Corporation of the west coast won this coveted honor. She is a splendid type of young American womanhood. In addition to her skill and patriotism, she is charming, graceful, and attractive.

I am sure that I speak the sentiment of this body when I say that the Congress of the United States joins with me in justifiable pride in the opportunity to welcome this fine young woman to the Capital City of the Nation. She is emblematical of the thousands of other splendid women who are contributing so much toward the ultimate goal with which we are all concerned—namely, an early and victorious conclusion of this war. Moreover, I am confident that the whole Congress joins with me when I say to you, Miss Anderson: We felicitate you, we salute you on behalf of a grateful American people for your efforts to that end.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the tax bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. DREWRY, MAGNUSON, and MAAS.

NAVAL TRUST FUNDS AND ACCOUNTING PROCEDURE

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. UNITED NATIONS FOOD CONFERENCE

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, no doubt the American farmers will be intensely interested to learn that they are to be the first group to be liquidated under the grandiose scheme that is being concocted by the so-called food conference at Hot Springs to make our Nation over into a totalitarian state and to put it under the heel of a world dictatorship.

According to newspaper reports, the blueprint-drawing section of the new world order, which is headed by Alexey D. Krutikov, chairman of the Soviet delegation to the conference, has advanced what amounts to a proposal to abolish individual ownership of farms and to set up collectivization of farming as it now exists in Russia.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. SAUTHOFF asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and include therein certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

WE PROTEST

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to an alleged procedure or practice in the War Department in the issuance of certificates of disability for discharge, where pressure has been brought upon servicemen to sign affidavits or make admissions, without full knowledge or information, that they are suffering from disabilities alleged to exist prior to their induction into the Army, as an inducement to secure certain benefits. Such allegations or admissions may be without any foundation of truth based on the facts. If this practice has been indulged in, it is reprehensible and should be stamped out at once.

In accordance with consent heretofore given, I include as a part of my remarks an editorial appearing in the Disabled American Veterans' Semi-Monthly of its issue of April 29, entitled "We Protest," in which this practice is discussed and which is worthy of consideration by the Members of the Congress:

WE PROTEST

Through actual contact with soldiers or their parents, and through correspondence received from wide sections of the country, our attention has been called to a situation existing in the Army which we hope will be immediately corrected. We cannot believe that the condition is the result of general orders or that the commanding general knows anything about it.

We are referring to the policy of certain Army officials seeking to obtain false statements and affidavits from soldiers or the parents of soldiers who are about to be discharged because of mental or physical conditions which in the opinion of the medical officers, render them unfit for military service. The requests are unlawful in themselves. The methods used in obtaining these false statements are reprehensible and can serve no good purpose.

For example, we have in our possession a communication sent to the mother of a soldier advising her that her son was hospitalized and suffering from a severe mental disability. It further requested that she sign the enclosed affidavit to the effect that she knew of his mental condition prior to his entrance into the service and that she would assume complete responsibility over him if he were released and sent home to her. The mother had not seen the son in 11 months and was unaware that he ever suffered from any nervous or mental disability. He had not been ill at any time prior to his entrance into the service, except for childhood maladies. Yet, almost hysterical upon learning that her son was seriously ill, she was ready to sign anything in order to protect and aid him. She was counseled to make no false affidavit regarding her knowledge of her son's condition, to advise the Army officials of the facts and to insist that they properly care for him. As a result, the Army reconsidered and recorded the condition as "incurred in line of duty." The man was discharged and transferred to a mental institution of the Veterans' Administration as should have been done at the first.

Another instance called to our attention involved a soldier who was threatened with dishonorable discharge unless he signed a statement to the effect that he knew the heart condition (for which he was to be discharged) existed prior to his enlistment several months before. The fact in this case disclosed that the man had never sought or received medical attention for any disability prior to his enlistment, and nobody was more surprised than he to discover that his heart was bad. He was greatly upset that his Army career was to end so abruptly as he was slated for officers' training and had every hope of "making good." He has refused to sign the false statement but what we want to know is why he was threatened and bulldozed in an effort to make him sign it. Space prevents us from relating similar incidents. We do not object to the Army discharging a man who is found to be unfit for the duties of a soldier. What we do object to is the crude method whereby certain Army officials attempt to falsify a man's service record in an effort, apparently, to protect the Government from future claims for benefits.

We know, and the public knows, that many men are going to break under the stress and strain of intensive training—necessary intensive training. There is nothing for the Army to apologize about and there is no need for them to maintain a policy whereby they endeavor to charge the breakdown of these men to inadequate personalities or to conditions which existed prior to enlistment. The responsibility is not the Army's; the responsibility is the Government's. The Veterans' Administration is authorized and qualified to subsequently determine whether or not the conditions which rendered the man unfit for the duties of a soldier were incurred in line of duty or existed prior to enlistment.

It is no more disgraceful for a man to break in training or in combat than it is for a student flyer to crash before he has earned his wings. Frankly, we do not like the methods being used by some military units which have been endeavoring to secure affidavits from ignorant and frightened parents to the effect that they know of and are aware of their son's condition and are willing to accept the responsibility of his care even though they have not seen him in months and where the facts indicate that the man has never been seriously ill prior to his entrance into military service.

Why should the military assume the right to break the law of the land in an effort to secure false affidavits through duress or fear when such methods have not only been frowned upon but have resulted in severe punishment when indulged in by citizens who make up this Government? We only hope and pray that the situation or the method used is not general and that the general staff of the Army is unaware of the situation and will act immediately to correct it in all phases. As servicemen, with some knowledge of the military forces of the United States, we accept the right of the military to discharge a man with the comment that in the opinion of the authorities who ordered the discharge the condition existed prior to enlistment, but we emphatically protest the actions of a few individuals who, in their enthusiasm, feel that they are entitled to use despicable methods in an effort to falsify official records to justify their actions. If this policy continues and becomes general, the service records and their contents will become valueless because of the opinion that will be formed that where the record is adverse to the soldier, it was obtained through fraud or duress.

This protest must not be taken as an effort to retard the war effort. Rather we feel that the bitterness engendered by the methods the Army is now using is doing real injury to the service and breaking down that confidence in the military which is absolutely necessary if we are to continue as a united people, bent upon our main objective—the winning of the war.

The entire problem will be solved when the Army and the Government adopt the policy that when a man has been examined and accepted into the military service he is considered to be in sound mental and physical condition except for those conditions noted by the medical examiners and made of record at the time of his acceptance. It is the only equitable solution. It is the American way.

Mr. Speaker, being deeply concerned over this alleged practice of the War Department in prejudging the cases of such discharged servicemen, I wrote to the Secretary of War asking to be advised as to the facts with reference to this alleged practice. Following is a copy of my letter to the Secretary, and his reply:

MAY 21, 1943.

Hon. HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Mr. Herman E. Lafky, commander, Department of Oregon, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, has called to my attention a practice which he states exists in the War Department, of discharging disabled servicemen with foreign combat service, on the basis of alleged preexisting disabilities, and requiring them to prejudge and prejudice their case by signing releases of all disabilities before receiving consideration for present disabilities.

I will appreciate it if you will advise me if such a policy does exist, and the reason therefor.

Yours truly,

HOMER D. ANGELL,
Member of Congress.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 26, 1943.

Hon. HOMER D. ANGELL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. ANGELL: This acknowledges receipt of your letter of May 21, 1943, addressed to the Secretary of War, concerning disability discharges from the Army, which question was brought to your attention by Mr. Herman E. Lafky, commander, Department of Oregon, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States.

Army regulations provide that a certificate of disability for discharge will state whether such disability was incurred in line of duty or not in line of duty, together with the facts upon which a decision is based; whether the enlisted man declined treatment for the relief of the disability when the same was directed; whether disability was due to his own misconduct or whether a preexisting disability, injury, or disease was or was not aggravated in line of duty by active military service, together with the nature of duty causing aggravation.

All individuals subject to disability discharge are examined by a board of officers who give consideration to the interests of the Government and of the enlisted man equally and impartially. Questions of doubt which cannot be decided factually are resolved in favor of the enlisted man. Whether the disability becomes apparent inside or outside the continental United States has no bearing on the decision as to the preexistence of the disability.

Pensions are paid by the United States where it is determined that disability resulted from personal injury or disease contracted in line of duty or for aggravation of a preexisting injury or disease contracted or suffered in line of duty when such disability was incurred in or aggravated by active military service, unless the result of the individual's own misconduct.

On March 17, 1943, Public Law 10 (78th Cong.) was enacted, amending Veterans Regulations No. 10, granting hospitalization, domiciliary care, and burial benefits to individuals honorably discharged for non-service-connected disability.

I trust the above information is sufficient to clarify this subject for your constituent.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN W. MARTYN,
Administrative Assistant.

Mr. Speaker, I am not fully convinced that the practice as outlined by the Secretary of War is such as to preserve the rights of servicemen who are not only endangering their lives and subjecting themselves to critical disabilities but in many cases are making the supreme sacrifice in defense of our country. I agree with the editorial above quoted that when our Government accepts these men for service they subject them to critical and exhaustive examinations to determine their physical and mental condition, and such examinations should be binding upon the Government. Certainly in the stress and strain of this all-out war these men when becoming disabled in line of duty should not be required to prejudge and prejudice their cases by admissions or affidavits or examinations made by Government officers under war conditions where it is difficult to ascertain the truth as to whether existing disabilities arising during service were due in any part to preexisting conditions. Many of these men who are subjected to the great strain of mental and physical endurance in the icy barren waste lands of Attu or the swamps of Guadalcanal are unable to withstand the enormous demands upon them and as a result become hospital cases. Is it fair to these disabled servicemen for our Government under these conditions to require them to certify to a record which may be entirely false and which ultimately will deprive them of just benefits to which they are entitled from our Government?

Mr. Speaker, when the war ends, and God grant it may be soon, upward of 10,000,000 of the young manhood of our Nation will be returning to their homes. The first question that will present itself to them is, What will be their opportunity in their homeland to which they offered their lives to defend? Will they find remunerative employments open to them where they may again enter into the responsibilities of citizenship in a free world? These post-war problems require the consideration of every one of us, particularly Members of the Congress, who are charged with the responsibility of enacting the necessary legislation to make possible the reabsorption of these servicemen from a war economy into civilian pursuits in a world at peace. We must not only be certain that the men who return disabled and broken in body and spirit will be cared for with every consideration possible, but we also must make certain that the able-bodied will not be turned loose in a world which offers them no hope for continued self-respecting employment. It may well be that for a year or a year and a half after peace comes that our Government will find it necessary to continue the servicemen on the Government pay roll pending the time that avenues of employment open to them.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceeed for 1 minute and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to report to the Membership of the House that it was my privilege to be a member of the official party at the launching of the liberty ship which was named in honor of our late friend, the Honorable William Tyler Page. The launching took place at noon, May 31, at the Bethlehem Fairfield Shipyards near Baltimore, Md. It was one of the most impressive sights that I have ever witnessed, and I have returned inspired by the first-hand knowledge of the tremendously important and effective part that private enterprise and labor are playing in the winning of this global war. It was my privilege to talk to Vice President Willis of the great Bethlehem organization whose genius and initiative are making it possible for us to build 10,000-ton ships in less than a month's time. The William Tyler Page is the one hundred and forty-fourth Liberty ship completed in these yards. I also talked to many of the workmen who indicated to me and other members of our party their determination that ships will be delivered to our Government on time.

It was a great inspiration, Mr. Speaker, to see great shipbuilding officials such as Mr. Willis and others working in close harmony with thousands and thousands of skilled workmen who are building ships with incredible speed.

The inspiration to name this ship for the late William Tyler Page came from our former House employee, John O. Snyder, who was a friend of William Tyler Page for 42 years. The resolution suggested by Mr. Snyder was introduced by our colleague the gentleman from New York, the Honorable JOSEPH L. PFEIFER. With the assistance of the gentleman from Virginia, Hon. OTIS BLAND, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine, and with the assistance of the Maritime Commission, the name for this ship was sent to the Bethlehem-Fairfield organization at Baltimore.

Miss Joanne Cronin, granddaughter of William Tyler Page, sponsored the ship. She is the daughter of Capt. and Mrs. Joseph C. Cronin, of Memphis, Tenn., where Captain Cronin is the commandant of the naval air station. Among those who were in the official party were relatives and very close friends of the late William Tyler Page. They included the Honorable Chauncey Reed, of Illinois; John C. Page, John Andrews, James P. Griffin, employees of the House of Representatives; Will P. Kennedy, of the Washington Evening Star; Mr. and Mrs. Harry Pierce and daughter Patricia, of Collingswood, N. J. Mrs. Pierce is a daughter of William Tyler Page. John Page is the son of William Tyler Page. Also in the party were Mrs. Bertha Taylor Voorhorst, of the American's Creed Association, and Miss Antoinette Hart, secretary to Congressman PFEIFER. We are deeply indebted to Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Willis for their unusual hospitality and assistance in giving the official party full information regarding the building of the William Tyler Page. Mr. Willis is the vice president and general manager of the Bethlehem-Fairfield shipyards where these great Liberty ships are being constructed.

The official party was escorted to the shipyards by officials and employees of the company and there found a gallant ship of over 10,000 tons ready to be launched. We were thrilled, Mr. Speaker, as we faced that ship with the full name William Tyler Page painted on its prow. As the noon-day whistle blew, thousands of workmen joined us in singing the Star-Spangled Banner and in reciting the American's Creed, and as the beautiful little granddaughter of the great patriot for whom the ship was named, burst the bottle of champagne against the prow of the ship, it slid down the ways majestically amidst the cheers of thousands of American men and women, amidst the screaming of whistles and the waving of innumerable flags.

The launching of the William Tyler Page was one of the most inspiring sights I have ever witnessed, and as I stood there watching this beautiful ship touch the water for the first time, I felt that on board would remain the spirit of William Tyler Page, the author of the American's Creed, a gentleman who was born in the shadows of the home of Barbara Fritchie "in the land made rich with corn" and in whose veins ran the blood of the cavaliers of Virginia, a man who has been the adviser of hundreds of Representatives of the people and a man who served the greatest deliberative body in the world—the House of Representatives—for 60 years.

Mr. Speaker, we had the privilege of talking with the gentleman who will be captain of the William Tyler Page, with the chief engineer, and with some of the members who will compose the crew which, in a few days, will sail the sea on the new Liberty ship William Tyler Page. From the lips of the builders, from the lips of the crew, and from the lips of many workmen, we learned that in these great shipyards the service of William Tyler Page was well known and that his spirit not only will remain alive as long as the William Tyler Page sails the seas for victory, but forever will be part of the spirit behind the men who build ships that go down to the sea and the essence of the spirit of the real heart of America.

TRANSPORTATION—KEY TO VICTORY

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, my attention has frequently been called to a potential weakness in our transportation system. It is well known that the link of transportation from farm and factory to firing line is essential to the winning of the war. That transportation system consists of railroads, ships, airplanes, and trucks and trailers on the highways. It is this latter that has the earmarks of potential weakness.

Close to 5,000,000 trucks and trailers normally operate over the highways in the United States. Our usual, pre-war, annual additions of new truck and trailer equipment have been roughly 10 percent on the average—more in the case of common carriers and less for those privately operated.

With the enlarged use of all forms of transportation, due to the war effort, the trucks and trailers have and are being operated longer hours and with greater loads. Quite naturally these trucks and trailers are wearing out far faster than ever before.

What is being done to replace this equipment as it wears out? Virtually nothing. And therein you have the makings of a break-down in highway transportation—a break-down that in turn will affect adversely all other forms of transportation as well as the war effort and the civilian population.

Over a year ago the War Production Board practically halted the manufacture of trucks and trailers. Some few units have been permitted but all told it would not account for but a small percent of normal needs. There were a number of trucks and trailers on hand at the time manufacture was stopped. But taking all these in the so-called pool plus those manufactured we have put into service in the last 16 months less than one-half a normal year's addition to our highway transport system. By July 1 there will be no more light trucks left in the pool, and by August 1 there will be none of any type left.

No contribution to the war and civilian effort can be more important than a healthy transportation system. And we face a break-down in an important link unless action is taken promptly.

It is quite likely that the manufacturers of trucks and trailers are so busy with other war orders that they, like the manufacturers of agricultural implements, do not care whether they manufacture their regular line or not.

Potential post-war backlog of sales is not half as important as a continuous, smooth, functioning highway transportation system throughout the war. The so-called backlog of sales that is growing for post-war rehabilitation is but an indication of how far highway transportation has already broken down. From the April 2 issue of the Wall Street Journal I quote the following:

> During the past 15 months a total of 630,000 potential civilian truck sales have accumulated for peacetime business, according to F. F. Staniford, sales manager of Mack Trucks, Inc. Basing his figures on an average of 44,500 truck sales per month during the years 1937 to 1941, inclusive, Mr. Staniford subtracted the civilian truck sales made during 1942 to arrive at his total. Roughly, 6 out of every 100 normal truck requests have been met in the past year, and this ratio is expected to hold for the duration of the war.
> This means, according to the Mack sales manager's figures, that at the end of 1943 a backlog of well over a million potential truck sales will have accumulated. Every additional month of war adds 42,000 to this figure.

If the above figures are correct then our efficient highway transportation system of trucks and trailers, that existed prior to the war, is disintegrating or going out of business at the rate of about 1 percent a month. Think of it—our vital highway transportation system going out of business at the rate of 1 percent a month. Yet despite this curtailment in operating units, the trucks and trailers are expected to carry more and more goods. There are more products of the factory, mine, forest, and farm to be transported. A diminishing transportation system cannot transport an increased quantity over the highways. Either the products will not be hauled or other transport mediums, already overburdened, will suffer.

New trucks and trailers do not come from a spigot. You cannot draw off at will the quantity you desire. America found this out with reference to agricultural implements. It takes time to convert plants back to the manufacture of trucks and trailers—time to get the maerial allocated and time to physically manufacture them. Even if it were decided this very day to provide for an enlarged program of truck and trailer manufacture, it would perhaps be late this fall before any came off the assembly line.

One can easily understand the action of the War Production Board on the outbreak of the war in cutting out the manufacture of trucks and trailers. At that time the rubber situation looked pretty bleak. But so far as essential transport is concerned, the rubber problem has been solved. Rubber can no longer be a reason for allowing our highway transportation system to go to pieces.

The thing that is difficult to understand is why the War Production Board and the Office of Defense Transportation now sit idly by and permit our highway transport system to disintegrate. These bodies are equally responsible for the forthcoming break-down in highway transportation—a break-down that is certain to come if action is delayed longer. Do we have material for Shipshaw and similar projects outside the country when our domestic highway transportation system is going to ruin? If we do it is time the American people were given all the facts.

OUTLAWING STRIKES

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House preserves its good judgment on labor legislation. Any bill making strikes unlawful, instead of strengthening our war effort, will throw this country into such a turmoil that we shall have little time to give to the war effort.

If we have no precedents in this country, surely we will not shut our eyes to history—especially recent history. England has been wise enough to make no law outlawing strikes. She has had more damaging strikes than we have, but still she refused to pass an anti-strike law. Why? First, England is convinced that saying a thing is wrong by law doesn't carry any power unless such a law is supported by public opinion. We have tried that with prohibition. We declared by law that it was unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors. Instead of stopping drinking it only made the matter worse. When such a law was passed many people who never drank before started in for the first time. The law was not respected. Finally, convictions could not be obtained, and the experiment had the tendency to weaken respect for all laws.

Then, too, England had spread before her view the events in France when the French Government repealed all labor laws. The resentment in France was so intense that she fell an easy victim to a military machine that could not have prevailed if the French people had been united in spirit and in purpose.

In the United States events have proven that those who belong to organized labor unions are just the same kind of people as the rest of us are. They have their sons in the armed forces; their boys are being shot up on many battlefields. Is there anyone in this House who contends that these people are not as patriotic as the best of any other class of citizen?

We have had no perceptible stoppage of production on account of labor troubles. Ninety-eight percent of those employed in our war effort have done nothing but work in our common defense. This, in spite of the fact that every year accidents claim thousands of lives and result in 2,000,000 injuries. And in spite of the fact that no matter what their wages have been, the cost of food, clothing, and housing has gone up faster than the rise in wages. Untold thousands of families engaged in war production have barely been able to keep driving ahead. Their struggles have not been told by this Congress nor have we investigated the conditions in which they live. No, thousands have made no complaint, but have done their best.

Shall we now, because there has been trouble in some quarters, say that the whole of organized labor shall be condemned? We already have laws on the statute books to meet extreme emergencies. The power to execute the laws has been lodged with the President. He has exercised the power wisely and is not seeking any more laws on the subject. Recent events show that the President has been patient but firm.

Organized labor has had a struggle—covering long weary years—to arrive at a measure of protection. The Congress, since 1934, has not failed to give to labor the protection it deserved. Now, at one fell swoop, shall we repeal all we have done and force labor back to the dark days of industrial slavery in the name of the war effort? We are playing with dynamite when we attempt such a move. Suppose we pass this law and 10,000 men strike because the wages they receive will not supply themselves, their wives, and children with sufficient food, clothing, and shelter? All will be criminals. All will be tried, and under the Constitution, each one has the right to be confronted with the witness against him. We shall have 10,000 trials. If found guilty, 10,000 will be sent to jail and the breadwinners who dig in the darkness of the underground will be taken away from families which will overnight become destitute. Ten thousand strikers is a small body. Suppose we have a strike of 50,000. We shall have 50,000 trials and, if convicted, 50,000 of the same breadwinners will be sent to jail. Suppose we have a strike involving 200,000 workers. Do we want 200,000 trials and do we want to lock up 200,000 workers and leave their families objects of charity?

To simply state this situation is to prove how utterly inane such a move would be.

What else will this bill do? It slaps 14,000,000 loyal citizens in the face. It says to them, "Watch your step or to jail you go." Ninety-eight percent of these people have done nothing but work just like the rest of us in our common effort to give our boys all the protection possible. Can anyone on this floor say a miner is not willing to protect his son? The passage of this bill, instead of harmonizing and increasing our common purpose to drive out the enemy, will cause disunion and destruction and will build in this country such a dissatisfaction with our Government that there will be no united and determined purpose which we must have to win this war. We may have the best guns and the best war equipment in the world, but that is not enough in this struggle. We must have the heart to fight, the purpose to defend a great country that guarantees to all the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Love of our country is the strongest bulwark of its defense.

Many people in this country have always been against organized labor and war offers them the opportunity they have waited for—to crush labor and set it back half a century. Those who would do this do not think—those who want to do this have not stopped to consider that if labor can be crushed, it is only one more easy step to crush all individual effort in this great land. Capital and labor must work together if we are to maintain our system of government, and those of us who still believe in individual effort have done our best to maintain friendly relations between capital and labor. With the passage of this bill, I predict the nationalization of all enterprises in the United States. Those who desire to perpetuate individual effort are doing the most to destroy it. Those who take advantage of every opportunity to pounce upon labor are doing more to sovietize this Nation than all the Communist speakers in the world.

My admonition to this House is to keep its head. Say to the world that in the United States a democracy can remain united, a democracy can protect both capital and labor, and that a democracy united and aroused cannot be defeated by any power or combination of powers on earth.

Strikes are caused by several influences, among the more important of which are:

The increased cost of living that has mounted faster than the increase in wages.

Increased profits of employers which are out of proportion to the total wage cost brought about by wartime production.

We are engaged in a great experiment in the United States today. Many people in the world today do not believe that a democracy like ours which supports private capital can function at full capacity in time of stress. This is no time to change systems. We have the capitalistic system now and we have a war now and our duty to our country is to make the present system work. So far as legislation can go to bring about a mutual and cooperative relation between capital and labor, that legislation should be forthcoming. But when labor has only one right—the right to strike in order to bring about justice to labor, we should decline to take away that right.

I am firm in the belief that if wages were based on the amount of production that labor was capable of turning out, there would be very little trouble between capital and labor. The more production, the more profits to the employer, and if we add another factor—more wages in that event—we shall have solved much of the difficulty.

If the laborer knew that all of the profits were going to his Government, there would be no incentive to strike, but since we have the individual profit system in this country and must make it work now, we could contribute to a better understanding between capital and labor if both were to receive equal benefits from the highest production possible. I believe contracts with labor should be drawn on that principle.

We should be in closer touch with the food, housing, and clothing problems of labor. Men who work with their hands need substantial food—need meat and lots of it. We should see that no O. P. A. order and coupon points prescribed by that agency should interfere with the flow of meat products to the men who labor. We should remember that from January 1941 to March 1943 food prices increased 40.5 percent and during the same period the cost of clothing increased 26.7 percent. We should know more about the housing conditions of labor, and when it is obvious that the wage received cannot possibly cover the necessary expense of labor, we should not hesitate to satisfy the demands of labor on that score.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to confirm what the gentleman has said about the miners not having sufficient meat. That is the report I get from the mining camps in my State. I noticed a headline today which reads: 530,000 miners on strike. Does the gentleman know whether the bill we will have before us in a few days applies only to those who have contracts?

Mr. BURDICK. I could not answer the gentleman because I have not seen the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. If that is the case, the passage of such a law would not apply to the soft-coal miners at all.

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is right.

Mr. Speaker, when we have determined the cause of strikes, we will be able to settle the warfare between capital and labor. No one can make me believe, from all the evidence available now, that the United Mine Workers desire to interrupt our war effort. There is some cause back of these strikes that has not been presented to us. No one can make me believe that John L. Lewis wants to stifle our war effort and that he is not a patriotic citizen. He, like other leaders, cannot always control his membership—but at the same time he is fully aware of the cause lying back of strikes, and will not desert his members—if convinced they are right in their demands. Congress is not informed on these matters—at least there is insufficient information to warrant this Congress going in roughshod and making it a criminal offense for any laborer to strike.

If this Congress can keep its head as well as the President has in this labor trouble, our production will go forward and we can convince the world that capital and labor can work together—that the result of our common efforts will demonstrate the solidarity of the people of the United States.

Our war production thus far has not only astonished the world but ourselves as well. Manufacturers, laborers, and those directing our war effort are to be enthusiastically thanked by the American people. We are doing the job—our planes and ships are coming off the production line in never-ending streams. Our men are being trained to man these engines of war in a remarkably short period of time—yet they have demonstrated on the battle front that they have the highest ability and the best machines in the world today.

There is also in the United States today a unanimity in the war effort that has taken the heart out of our enemies. We have made mistakes and will make some more, but on the whole our war effort has already made itself felt in every corner of the earth. Less incrimination, less inclination to class every one who disagrees with us, as foreign snipers and traitors, less inclination to find fault with those directing our war effort, will do more to bring forth the utmost war effort than anything else this Congress can do. Politics should be entirely out of our discussions. It is not important that we win the next election but it is important that we win the war.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I think the Members of the House should congratulate Mr. Prentiss Brown for accepting the resignation of Dr. James K. Galbraith, Chief Price Specialist, and his deputy, which was submitted to him and accepted yesterday. Dr. Galbraith has been one of the stumbling blocks to the successful administration of the price-control law. I do not know if Dr. Galbraith is more than a puppet in his position in the O. P. A., but I am inclined to believe that he has been used as a tool by someone higher up. I have been trying to figure out who the superman could be in the administration, to give all of the directions in this new scheme of remaking our American economy and our way of life. I know the President is busy in the war effort. I know he has certain associates like Harry Hopkins, who resides in the White House, but the thought occurs to me that it might be a man by the name of Benjamin Cohen, formerly of the team of Corcoran and Cohen, that dictated most of the policies during the early days of the New Deal. I think we ought to investigate Benjamin Cohen and see what he is doing to change our system of free enterprise and way of life. For the time being I am grateful that Dr. Galbraith is no longer in the Government service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JONKMAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, on Monday May 17 last, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] made a speech on the floor of the House in which he attacked my remarks in which he attacked my remarks in support of H. R. 2698 to repeal the Renegotiation Act.

The gentleman began by ascribing to me a lack of perspective when he said:

First the gentleman from Michigan evidently overlooked the fact that any company doing less than $100,000 worth of business each year is exempt from renegotiation, and the suggestion has been made to Congress that this be increased to $500,000.

And then the gentleman from Texas claimed that this exemption removes almost all small business from the scope of the law. Now if the gentleman will consult my remarks, he will find on page 4322 of the RECORD that I did not overlook this provision, but did refer to it and said—

But this affects—exempts—only a little outer fringe.

Then in the next breath the gentleman confirms the truth and soundness of my statement aforesaid when he goes on to say:

Moreover if he had looked closely—

I wonder if the gentleman thought he saw a mote in my eye—

at the figures on the companies which have been cleared by the Price Adjustment Boards, he would have seen that many small businesses have not been required by the Boards to renegotiate their contracts because their profits were not excessive. The Navy Department for example has cleared without renegotiation 240 companies holding a total of $500,000,000 of contracts, that is, small companies.

May I assure him that it is not the gentleman from Michigan who failed to look closely, but instead the gentleman from Texas. If he will refer to my speech, page 4319 of the RECORD, he will find that I devote considerable attention to this exemption of a half a billion from renegotiation. And if the gentleman had looked closely and had done a little thinking, he would have noticed that $500,000,000 for 240 companies averages more than two million each. And the gentleman says, "That is, small companies." So according to the gentleman's own argument, exemption of five hundred thousand will not exempt any contractor, and my claim that it would affect only the outer fringe was conservative and sound, and it still stands. And I repeat, if it is a question of perspective, it shows that it is the perspective of the gentleman from Texas that is faulty, not mine. I prefer to think that the gentleman, who is an experienced, able and very active Member of this House, has so many matters on his mind, that like some others, he has not given this matter of renegotiation of contracts sufficient thought. But at all events, in his thoughtlessness in this phase of the argument, he has fallen on his own sword.

This should also dispose of his next argument that repeal is the masquerade of big business behind the name of small business. Such an attempt to confuse the issue and avoid the merits of the discussion by injecting a prejudice against big business, is an admission of lack of valid and meritorious arguments against the repeal. No one, and I least of all, wants to see any business, big or little, make excessive profits out of the war. I made this statement clearly in my remarks and insisted that there must be machinery to prevent undue Government loss. I expressly affirmed that the renegotiation law, at its inception and in the absence of maladministration, fulfilled a drastic need; but with the enactment of the 90-percent-excess-profits-tax law, it has become unnecessary. But I make bold to say that even if there were a few scoundrels who would make inordinate profits out of war and misery, they should be reached by other measures than one which hamstrings our war production and war effort, casts an intolerable and un-American burden on all industry, and threatens to destroy our economy, and with it jobs for our 10,000,000 soldiers and the other millions of war workers when we turn from war to peace. The burdens of this Renegotiation Act far, far outweigh the benefits.

The gentleman denies my statement that administration of the renegotiation law would require a great bureaucracy, and states that at the present it is composed of a little less than one thousand persons in the Army and Navy boards alone. However, according to the Truman committee, as of March 20 last, only one-half of 1 percent of the war contracts had been renegotiated. Estimates have been made that at that rate it will take 330 years with the present staff, to renegotiate the contracts as of that time, not to mention contracts subsequent to that date. I think we can agree that renegotiation of contracts should be completed in 5 years, and would therefore take 66 times the present staff, running into a personnel of over 60,000 in the various boards. We might, therefore, paraphrase the words of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD], "Hush, hush, price adjustment boards, hush your lonesome cry. Your number will be legion bye and bye."

To my claim that renegotiation is a serious and vital interference with war production and takes up too much of the time of the contractor's organization, the gentleman responds with only one case which he says took 50 days and during this time "some of the company's officials had to spend about 3 days on the matter." He does not say what officials spent about 3 days, nor does he state how much time other officials of that corporation had to lose from war production on renegotiation. I have received or read hundreds of letters and excerpts from letters stating that it is not only a tremendous interference with the war production of the contractors, but many of them emphasize not only the actual loss of production of weapons, but probable consequential losses. For instance, one writes that renegotiation prevented the production of 100 gun mounts for ships, and while it is speculative, asks how many ships and cargoes were lost for want of the guns which could not be placed on the ships without these gun mounts. Furthermore, it is well known that business counsel agencies advise war contractors as follows:

The contractor who knows his business, fares best before renegotiation boards. Production managers who can explain the history and operations of the company, make the best advocates. (See Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. A2288.)

These facts, together with the most favorable though lone example that the gentleman could find, shows that for almost one-sixth of the year, the heart and brains of war production industry is pulled off its job, not to mention the claimed upheaval in all operations in the industry.

Next the gentleman attacks my statement that the law is administered without a legislative standard or formula. He admits that the only standard in its application is what seems reasonable to a bureaucratic board, regardless of whether behind that board is the complex of Hitler, Hirohito, or Harry Hopkins. It has already been admitted that the four boards have widely varying standards. This is no reflection on the boards, for they get their orders from headquarters. He suggests that I could not suggest to Congress any better formula or standard which would work. Precisely, and as I said in my remarks, because it is government by bureaucracy and not by laws; because no standard or formula can be evolved it is unworkable, and because it is unworkable and destroys private enterprise, we should junk it instead of junking private enterprise.

Following this, the gentleman attacks my claim that the renegotiation law enables the departments to by-pass Congress and secure money in the nature of appropriations, over which Congress has no control. He states that if the Congress appropriated for four bombers, and the department has asked for enough money to get six, it is not circumventing the will of Congress to get two extra bombers in this manner. This answers itself. The gentleman is careful to use bombers for his example. He knows the American people feel such a need for bombers in this emergency that they would with difficulty hesitate to beg, borrow, or steal them. I share this emotion. But supposing it is tanks which may be outmoded by antitank guns, or any other weapons which the gentleman, in a subsequent part of his address admits are being supplanted by others. Anyway, I still claim it is for Congress to authorize the two additional bombers, and to say that the money for two additional bombers should be appropriated. Instead of that the gentleman from Texas says, "The Army, by increasing the purchasing power of its appropriation, has reduced the need for further appropriations in the future." What is this other than an admission that the departments are by-passing Congress and will spend what they wish from a tremendous fund of their own. And I still maintain that Congress should retain this prerogative instead of delegating the power of appropriations for further needs to the departments by continuing the Renegotiation Act.

The gentleman's next attack is on my argument that renegotiation settlements are not voluntary on the part of the war contractor. His answer, it seems to me, is without merit. He attacks none of the reasons which I gave as eliminating the contractor's freedom to fight, through fear of retaliatory action by the departments. He is right when he states that an appeal lies to the Secretaries of the War and Navy Departments, which I have shown in the above-named reasons, is of no practical value. But the gentleman is wrong when he states, "There is no doubt about the legal ability of the contractor to appeal to the courts." The standard contract; yes, all contracts provide that on questions of fact the contractor may appeal to the Secretary of the Department, whose decision shall be final. Inasmuch as there are practically no questions of law, but all disagreements would present questions of fact, this precludes the contractor's appeal to the courts.

In the next observation, the gentleman for once agrees with me in part that contracting officers of the Departments should seek closer prices and that pricing should improve. However, it should be obvious that the very nature of the Price Renegotiation Act precludes this. The act inherently makes close pricing not only absolutely unnecessary, but positively discourages it. Loose pricing is the surest method of insuring the greater recoveries of the Price Adjustment Bureau and of warranting its perpetuation. In fact and effect the Price Renegotiation Act is a totalitarian measure enabling the Departments to order the production of matériel at whatever prices they wish to allow at a future date. Its principle is ruinous not only to the war effort but to our whole economic system, yes, even to our political concept of constitutional government. It is no wonder that under such a concept the gentleman thinks that, having bought 2,000,000 antiaircraft shells a month last year, it would be impossible for a procurement official to fix a fair price on 40,000,000 per month in this year. I do not think that this would offer any difficulty. It might have been difficult to arrive at a fair figure on 40,000,000 for the first order, but with previous experience I see no difficulty whatsoever. This same reasoning applies to allowances for contingencies such as labor stoppages, changes in specifications, and similar elements in contracts which the gentleman thinks cannot be reasonably arrived at in making a contract. However, I do not wonder that the reasonableness of totalitarianism cannot see this. It does not have to.

The gentleman's main and final argument is that I am all wrong not only in saying that the 90 percent excess-profits tax will accomplish all that is sought to be accomplished by the Renegotiation Act, but he boldly claims that we have no 90 percent excess-profits tax. It is his further claim that we have an 80-percent tax and not a 90-percent tax. But here again it seems to me that the gentleman, by seeking to distinguish between a percentage tax and a tax rate, is muddling the situation instead of clarifying it. While he pretends it, he is adding nothing new in calling attention to the 10 percent refund to corporations when peace is declared. I had, as I said, in fairness mentioned it, but with the observation that after hostilities cease we do not know when peace will be declared, nor is there certainty that corporations can use it at will. This refund is therefore of very doubtful value.

Let me make my position clear. It is my understanding that the tax rate on corporations consists of a 40 percent normal tax on their base or normal earnings, and a 90 percent excess-profits tax on their annual earnings in excess of their basic annual earnings. It is true the law also provides that the total tax on any company shall not exceed 80 percent of its taxable income.

It must be obvious that this 80-percent clause is a protection; that refuge can be sought in it only by corporations which had a low normal, average, or basic income. According to the Bureau of Internal Revenue it is true that this is the exception and not the rule, and on last year's corporation tax, only twenty and three-tenths millions of taxes were saved by those who sought refuge in the 80-percent clause, compared to over two billions of taxes collected from corporations. In other words a corporation earning $4,000,000 last year, whose base earnings were $2,000,000, would pay 40 percent on $2,000,000 and 90 percent on the two millions of excess profits regardless of whether it is for war contracts or civilian supplies; regardless of whether it is excessive profits or merely excess profits. This corporation would pay two million six hundred thousand in taxes.

Inasmuch as under the 80-percent provision it is protected from paying more than three million two hundred thousand on the four million, it finds no relief in the 80-percent clause, and it must pay the 90 percent excess-profits tax. However, if this same company had basic earnings of $1,000,000 a year, it would pay 40 percent on this million, and 90 percent on the excess of three millions, or a total tax of three million one hundred thousand, and still it would have no occasion to avail itself of the 80-percent clause. The fact, however, that it came dangerously near to the line, makes further illustration unnecessary. It is only corporations which had an exceedingly and unusually low base earning power in peacetime, and comparatively great profits when the excess-profits tax began to operate, which can avail themselves of this protective provision. And as I said before, it is the exception rather than the rule to so great an extent that apparently corporations could save only one-tenth of 1 percent of the corporation tax by its provisions.

It seems to me that these figures make it clear that the excess-profits tax will accomplish all that we seek to accomplish by the Renegotiation Act without the vices of the latter, and that, not to mention two and a half billions, there is no such savings under the Renegotiation Act as $250,000,000, or $500,000,000. The observation of the gentleman from Texas that perhaps I consider those as small sums is refreshing coming from the other side of the aisle.

The gentleman concludes his remarks by half a dozen instances in which he claims that contractors made many times more earnings in wartime than they did in peacetime. I, of course, cannot dispute these conclusions. However, these examples mean nothing for his argument. He does not speak in terms of dollars. A corporation which operated at a loss or at a very small profit, say a dime for a 5-year average, making 15 times as much, would only make $1.50, even though it was 15 times as much as in peacetime. Furthermore, it is apparent, inasmuch as the gentleman states that these figures are based upon taxes paid in 1942, that they must apply to the year 1941 before we had the 90-percent excess-profits tax. Lastly, none of these examples contain any evidence that the excess-profits tax would not have been an ample measure to recover for the Government all excess and excessive profits that can in justice be expected from the Renegotiation Act.

I believe I have now met, analyzed, and I hope answered every objection to repeal that has been advanced by the gentleman from Texas.

Before I close it is perhaps appropriate to make the observation that the gentleman did not answer, or even discuss, my ruling reason for repeal. That was that the bureaucrats, as they will almost generally do, instead of carrying out the will of Congress in a wholesome, beneficial, and remedial purpose for the benefit of the country, proceeded at once to usurp powers not in the act which wrecked its purpose and impaired the war effort and the general welfare of the Nation.

In my remarks I quoted from the act:

> The secretary of each department is authorized and directed—> whenever in his opinion excessive profits have been realized, or are likely to be realized, from any contract with such department * * * to require renegotiation of the contract price.

Had the bureaucrats carried out the will of Congress and confined themselves to excessive profits and contractors realizing excessive profits, many of the present vices would have been eliminated, and in the main it would have proved a wholesome measure. Such excessive profit contracts could have been detected from general sources, but specifically from the income-tax returns. In this way even the evil of the absence of a yardstick for determining what are excessive profits would have fallen on a small fragment of our war production.

But instead of confining themselves to such they immediately proceed to renegotiate all contracts, and not for excessive profits alone, but excess profits as well. Even the 240 companies which the gentleman from Texas said did not require renegotiation I claim were renegotiated. While the term may be of somewhat ambiguous connotation, to hold the contrary would be just as inconsistent as to say that a person had not been in a holdup, because, while the robber had put him in fear at the point of a pistol he had nothing on his person of which he could be robbed.

And when I speak of bureaucrats in this discussion, I do not mean the boards and investigators. I heave heard time and again that they are fine persons, and in the main I believe them to be. But these compliments are usually accompanied by the alleged statements of such officials, "We can only do what Washington orders us to do." Nor do I mean the Army and Navy. I have been told from various independent sources that the Army and Navy are not in favor of the Renegotiation Act. Whether this be true or not, from the multiplicity of these reports, I am inclined to believe it. But the question immediately presents itself; if this is true, and they are free to carry out their convictions, why don't they confine themselves to the plain intent of the law and decimate their burden? The answer is obvious. The real bureaucrats are those who constitute the invisible forces constantly at work to wreck the social, political and economic framework of our Nation, and establish a new order. Their destructive influence on our national policy, and especially our domestic economy, is giving cause for grave concern which is becoming more and more general. It is these bureaucrats, responsible for the rubber famine, the food production failure, the O. P. A. fiasco, who are also reaching for and retaining more power over our economy and our war production through the Renegotiation Act.

It is high time that the American people as a whole become realistic in this matter. The red herring which is drawn across the trail by the argument that the act prevents war millionaires is in the face of the 90 percent excess profits tax pure propaganda.

I repeat, we must have the courage to be realistic. It is true that in the early part of our defense and war production, lack of information on the tremendous reduction of costs through mass production resulted in some instances in enormous profits. But by this time this lack of knowledge has been overcome and these excessive profits have been recaptured.

We are now in grave danger through the renegotiation act and even the 90-percent excess-profits tax, of destroying the capital necessary for reconversion and tiding over when we change to peacetime production. The former allows corporations no margin, and the latter only a margin of doubtful value for this purpose.

It has long been accepted that it takes an average of $4,000 of capital to provide machinery and other essentials for each and every job. Lately, with the advance of technology, it is said this has been stepped up to $6,000 for each job. The bulk of the billions of this capital consists of savings, or stored labor from millions of small investors. Not only are they entitled to wages—dividends—on their stored labor, but also sufficient wages—profits—to replace their worn-out machinery and property. Millions of these small investors—many of them absolutely dependent on them for the necessaries of life—are deprived of these wages for their stored labor, and to many their capacity to produce—by their stored labor—is destroyed without social security, such as unemployment compensation to tide them over.

Even though our long-haired professors and star gazers may be indifferent to this fact, and show only contempt for industry, frugality, and thrift, we have the further consideration that unless this capital to provide jobs is conserved, unless this seed-money for jobs for reconversion is allowed to these corporations, there will not be the $6,000 nor any capital in thousands of industries to provide jobs for our 10,000,000 soldiers and millions of war workers when we convert to a peace economy.

And yet this is the very calamity we are running into with reckless abandon. Instead of excessive profits, thousands of corporations are unable to pay dividends because they are feverishly conserving profits to survive the conversion period and keep their workers on the pay roll in the meantime. I have heard of even large industries who, if the war should stop and their war orders be canceled, have not sufficient reserves to pay their employees for 1 week.

It is up to the American people to preserve this country from these crackpots and bureaucrats. It took the Truman committee, in January 1942, to blow the lid off the O. P. M., with its billions of waste without results in our war production. The administration, in sheer desperation, changed its attitude, came back to capital and labor—private enterprise, if you wish—and said, "Here, you take over the job," with the result that in a year we set a world record, notwithstanding the monkey wrenches thrown into the machinery by the long-haired professors and star-gazers.

We must do the same in the rest of our domestic problems. Not go back to the weaknesses and evils in the old system, but to its virility and driving power, minus those weaknesses which after all reside in the American people themselves. We have a terrific job on our hands, not only in winning this war but in overcoming the post-war problems in our economy as well. This is the problem of the American people. We do well to heed Jefferson's inhibition, "Were we to be directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread." We are on the threshold of the fulfillment of that prophecy now. Likewise if we continue to be directed from Washington in our economy by such bureaucrats and measures as direct the Renegotiation Act, we will soon want jobs. We owe to our fighting men on the far-flung battle lines and the seven seas the duty upon their return to provide them with jobs. Repeal of the act and abolishment of the bureaus created under it, will be a long step in that direction.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial from the Philadelphia Record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article by Mr. Walter Lippmann entitled "Last Days of White Elephant."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

VISITING PRESS CORRESPONDENTS FROM SOUTH AMERICA

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Capital of our Nation is honored today by being host to a group of representatives of the press who are on a good-will tour from our neighbors to the south—Cuba, Paraguay, and Chile. It has just been the privilege of some of us to enjoy a very delightful luncheon with these gentlemen. We found them to be as charming a group of gentlemen as it has been our pleasure to meet in a long while, and are delighted that they are here. As I said to them, we hope they will thoroughly enjoy their visit, remain long, and soon come again.

During that luncheon the suggestion was made, attributed to me but it did not originate with me, that it would be a good idea for all children in America to be required to study Spanish in grammar school and high school, and that the children of the South American countries be required to study English. While, as I say, the idea did not originate with me I consider it an excellent one and sincerely hope it may materialize.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JARMAN] may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JARMAN. I know of no way in which peoples of different nations can come to know each other as well and be as close to each other, as comradely, as brotherly, as neighborly, as for the peoples of the different nations to speak well, even though not fluently, the language of their neighbor; so it affords me pleasure to indulge in that suggestion and to express the hope that it may bear fruit in the years to come contributing toward a closer relationship between all 21 countries of this hemisphere, because it is in this hemisphere as we all know that the future not only of America but of the entire world lies. On the conduct of these 21 nations depends the future of the world.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I gladly yield to the charming gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman from Alabama believe that one way to achieve solidarity in the Western Hemisphere is through the good offices of our own very fine press at home and the press of the countries represented today by these extremely cultivated, gracious, and able gentlemen?

Mr. JARMAN. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts is undoubtedly correct; there is no group of people in those countries or our own country who are in position to accomplish more toward that end than the representatives of the press.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will yield further, may I say that the press of these countries is doing exceptionally fine work in bringing about understanding and appreciation of our common hopes and problems.

Mr. JARMAN. That is certainly true. All of us appreciate their fine contribution toward the war effort and American solidarity. When these able gentlemen return to their homelands their knowledge of America will enable them to accomplish even more along that line.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JARMAN. I gladly yield to my friend the distinguished gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. In furthering that great plan of solidifying our relations with the other American countries does not the gentleman believe it will be a good thing if we could have a convention, an agreement with them to standardize the moneys of the respective countries so that their gold peso and our gold dollar, their silver dollar and our silver dollar, would be standardized to a certain value which would make them pass current in both countries?

Mr. JARMAN. I regret to say I am not sufficiently familiar with money matters to know much about that but I unhesitatingly express the belief that the gentleman's thought is worthy of mature consideration. In other words, in the vernacular of the street, I am impressed with the probability that "he has something."

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the bill (H. R. 2714) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include a statement by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations subcommittee on subversive activities of Federal employees and also to extend my own remarks in that connection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House and to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include the text of a resolution I have introduced and a number of letters I have received.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. LUDLOW addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Leave of absence was granted by unanimous consent, as follows:

To Mr. TALBOT, for 1 week, on account of important business.

To Mr. VAN ZANDT, for an indefinite period, on account of official business.

To Mr. ELLSWORTH (at the request of Mr. HOLMES of Washington), for June 1 and June 2, on account of official business.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1943

(Legislative day of Monday, May 24, 1943)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of the Gunton Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, under the canopy of Thy grace and goodness we bow in adoration and thanksgiving, for hitherto Thou hast blessed us and we have found Thee faithful unto all Thy promises.

We pray that our President and Vice President and all Thy servants whom Thou hast called to positions of leadership in the life of our Republic may be graciously equipped for every task.

Grant that in these days, which are so significant in judgment and responsibility for all of us, we may find our refuge and strength in the reality of Thy wisdom and power.

May the blessings, which Thou dost bestow upon us, become contributions with which we shall seek to minister unto needy humanity and be dedicated to the dawning of that day when righteousness shall be triumphant and peace shall be enthroned in the hearts of men and of nations.

To Thy name, through Christ, our Lord, we ascribe the praise. Amen.

"Senate Resolution 32

"Resolution memorializing Congress to use their good influences to the end that sufficient metals be allocated to build and equip enough factories to produce at least 1,000,000 annual tons of synthetic rubber

"Whereas with 92 percent of our normal supply of rubber in control of the Japs, the Baruch Rubber Study Committee recommended that America should manufacture 1,106,000 tons annually of synthetic rubber in order to supply our necessary military and civilian vehicles with tires during this motorized war; and

"Whereas Rubber Director William M. Jeffers, has made every effort to follow the instructions of the Baruch report and get synthetic tires into production, but factory capacity has been cut to 43 percent of what the Baruch investigation said was necessary to keep America's essential motor vehicles rolling; and

"Whereas the transportation of freight and employees to and from Michigan war factories would be tragically crippled if more tires are not made available; and

"Whereas the farms of America and the petroleum industry can produce abundant supplies of grain alcohol and petroleum products, and our chemical, rubber, and other industries are well able to transform these basic ingredients into synthetic rubber: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Michigan Sixty-second Legislature of 1943 hereby expresses its full approval of Mr. Jeffers' efforts to keep the American military machine and civilian economy on wheels; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Michigan Legislature memorializes the Members of the United States Congress to use their good influences to the end that sufficient metals be allocated to build and equip enough factories to produce at least 1,000,000 tons annually of synthetic rubber; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States Senate, Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, majority and minority leaders of both the Senate and the House, all Michigan Congressmen and United States Senators, Rubber Director Jeffers, War Production Board Chairman Nelson, Economic Stabilization Director James C. Byrnes, Office of Defense Transportation Director Joseph Eastman, and Office of Price Administration Director Prentiss Brown.

"Adopted by the senate, March 25, 1943."

A resolution of the Michigan State Senate; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Resolution 40

"Resolution requesting Federal authorities to take immediate steps to make it possible for farmers to obtain necessary farm machinery for the production of crops

"Whereas many farmers in Michigan have applied to the various Federal authorities through State and county agencies for priorities on farm machinery, tools, etc., which are absolutely needed to assist in the fitting of the land, and the planting and production of farm crops; and

"Whereas it appears that all county rationing boards have allocated all the priorities that are allowable, and in some counties at least (and in Saginaw County as an example) three times as many applications have been filed as are allowable; and

"Whereas a great number of farmers are not able and under the present set-up at Washington will not be able to get the priorities on grain drills, tractors, etc., that are so much needed, and Michigan boards find their hands tied in making possible the assistance they realize should be offered: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved That the proper authorities at Washington be asked to remedy this situation at the earliest possible time; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Office of Price Administration, to the United States Department of Agriculture, and to the Michigan Members of Congress.

"Adopted by the Senate, April 30, 1943."

A resolution of the Michigan State Senate; to the Committee on Finance:

"Senate Resolution 34

"Concurrent resolution relative to memorializing Congress to enact Senate bill 450 regarding compensation to civilians

"Whereas the United States is engaged in a total war and many civilians are patriotically contributing their services in such necessary activities as civilian defense work; and

"Whereas many of these civilians, including the civilian defense workers may be injured and become burdens on their families or society unless provision is made to protect them from financial loss caused by such injuries; and

"Whereas the members of the Senate of the State of Michigan believe that the Federal Government should make provision to protect these citizens rendering invaluable service to our country: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact Senate bill 450 introduced by Senator Pepper which provides for compensation to civilians, including civilian defense workers; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and the Representatives from Michigan.

"Adopted by the Senate, March 26."

A resolution of the Michigan State Senate; to the Committee on Commerce:

"Senate Resolution 39

"Resolution requesting the United States Coast Guard to relax the ruling prohibiting fishing from boats in the St. Clair River, the Detroit River, and in the connecting channels through Lake St. Clair

"Whereas the United States Coast Guard has adopted and promulgated a ruling prohibiting fishing from boats in the St. Clair River, the Detroit River, and in the connecting channels through Lake St. Clair; and

"Whereas annually, between May 15 and July 1, there takes place a pickerel run in the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers affording recreation to thousands of defense workers and furnishing some 300,000 pounds of pickerel to noncommercial fishermen, thus affording a substantial source of food in cooperation with the rationing program; and

"Whereas the members of the senate are of the opinion that the permitting of noncommercial fishing from small boats could not in any way impede navigation or interfere with the war effort; and

"Whereas the members of the senate feel that recreational opportunities consistent with the war effort should be encouraged, in order that the people may attain a proper balance in living: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate, That the members of the senate request the United States Coast Guard to relax the ruling prohibiting fishing from boats in the St. Clair River, the Detroit River, and in the connecting channels through Lake St. Clair, so that fishing from small boats may be permitted under such restrictions and conditions as may be considered necessary to avoid conflict with commercial navigation in said waters; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the United States Coast Guard and to the Michigan Members in the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress.

"Adopted by the senate, April 30, 1943."

RESOLUTION OF INDIANA REPUBLICAN STATE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OPPOSING POST-WAR COMMITMENTS

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the Indiana Republican State Central Committee at its meeting held on Tuesday, May 4, 1943, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is continuing discussion among the members of the Republican Party within the State of Indiana of the position that the party should take with respect to the Nation's post-war policies; and

Whereas it is the opinion of the Republican State Central Committee that it should at this time make some expression on this subject for the consideration of the members of the party in this State: Now, therefore, be it hereby

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Republican State Central Committee of the State of Indiana that the United States Government should take its proper place with other nations in such international conferences as may follow this war and should recognize such relationships and obligations to its allies, and with its allies to the other nations of the world, as may be in keeping with the conditions and circumstances as then exist and as are compatible with the common interests of the American people; be it further

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Republican State Central Committee that our country should win the war and then stand firm and enforce our announced policy of unconditional surrender; that the Axis Powers should then be disarmed and there should and must be no armistice; that when the war is won, our 11,000,000 fighting men and women will again become integral parts of our civil government, that they will return to us fortified by first-hand information of conditions in foreign countries and will therefore be thoroughly qualified to participate in the formulation of a post-war program to preserve the peace and well-being of the world, and that no such post-war program should be determined without the benefit of the knowledge and judgment of our armed forces; and accordingly we believe that no political party can or should at this time feasibly engage in the making of detailed permanent commitments on post-war arrangements, but should confine itself to the general principles enunciated in the foregoing paragraph of this resolution.

Resolved by the Congress of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, That in the judgment of the society, any material modification or repeal of our basic laws dealing with the subjects of immigration and naturalization may result in great and irreparable injury to the United States and to the Nation's future destiny; and that, to say the least, any proposals for such modification or repeal may well await the final outcome of the fearful global struggle in which we are now engaged.

EXTENSION OF RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] proposing to add at the end of the pending joint resolution a new section. The Chair calls attention to the unanimous consent agreement limiting debate on the part of each Senator to 30 minutes on the joint resolution and 15 minutes on any amendment or motion relating thereto, no Senator to speak more than once on any amendment and on the joint resolution. Under the order of yesterday the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] is entitled to the floor on his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. MALONEY is as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution add the following new section:

"SEC. —. Effective on the date of enactment of this act, section 2 of such act of June 12, 1934, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(d) No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the first section of this act shall take effect until the Senate of the United States shall have advised and consented to its ratification, two-thirds of the Senators present concurring.'"

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Utah, [Mr. MURDOCK], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on important public business.

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BUCK], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Chair repeats the announcement that, under the unanimous-consent order, no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes on the pending joint resolution, or more than once nor longer than 15 minutes on any amendment thereto or motion thereon.

The senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has the floor. The time of the Senator from Connecticut to speak on the amendment has expired. He has thirty minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. MALONEY. I yield.

Mr. MCNARY. I remind the distinguished occupant of the Chair that all the unanimous-consent agreements ever entered into heretofore became effective after a quorum had been announced, if the absence of a quorum had been suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut was recognized before the quorum call, and yielded for the quorum call.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I assure the distinguished and thoughtful and very gracious minority leader that I shall have all the time I desire within the 30 minutes allowed me on the joint resolution.

Mr. MCNARY. At some future time I shall argue this question out with the parliamentarian. I have a very positive opinion on the subject.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will yield, I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent that he be granted an additional 15 minutes.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I am inclined toward the view expressed by the Senator from Oregon, and I do not want such a unanimous-consent request made. I think it would jeopardize the position taken by the Senator from Oregon, which I think is important. I prefer that the unanimous-consent request be not made, and I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the debate on this proposal up to now, as I did in 1940 and in 1937, and when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was first submitted to the Senate in 1934. On every occasion I voted against the measure then pending, and I shall vote against the joint resolution on this occasion, unless the amendment now under discussion shall be adopted. I voted for the amendment proposed by my distinguished colleague the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], but not because it was satisfactory to me. Even had that amendment been accepted by the Senate, I should oppose the joint resolution unless it contained the amendment which I now discuss.

Mr. President, I was particularly interested in the very able address made by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and I supported his amendment, but I wish to say for the record that I should not support the joint resolution even if it contained the amendment proposed by the able Senator from Wyoming, unless the amendment which I propose should also be adopted.

The question I raise is not a new one. It is more than 150 years old. It is a constitutional question. It originated in the minds of 55 men meeting at Philadelphia a long time ago. While I, for myself, have no doubt on this question, I urge other Senators, if there be any who have a doubt, that they resolve it in favor of the language of the Constitution, and I respectfully remind them that we cannot go wrong if we follow the direction signs and the guideposts of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, all the pending joint resolution does is to ask that the Congress surrender its constitutional and traditional prerogatives to make tariffs and approve treaties. It does not do anything more than that. These trade treaties, or so-called trade agreements, I should like to point out, might be used as instruments of economic aggression, and I borrow those words from those persons in the Department of State who have with complete abandon made an appraisal of the purposes of Members of Congress who offer opposition to the joint resolution. I do not believe that the administration, as I said the other day, would make any such use of the powers it now seeks. I merely point out, Mr. President, and I reiterate and should like to emphasize, that we are being asked to pass judgment on a method by which a policy—any sort of policy, let me point out—may be put into effect.

Mr. President, I said a long time ago in the Senate that the rights of States were being edged toward the grave. That is almost as serious a situation as any with which our Government could be confronted. But it is a little more serious to me when the Congress of the United States begins to surrender its powers, when the powers of the Congress are marching toward the grave.

In his eloquent discussion yesterday, the able and distinguished Senator from Wyoming, who, during all the years he has been a Member of the Senate, has been a protector of State rights and a defender of the Constitution, discussed this particular question at some length, and, because I do not intend to take a great deal of time of the Senate, partially for the obvious reason that I do not have the time, I am not permitted the time, I should like to associate myself with the constitutional aspects of the speech made yesterday by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. President, year after year since I came to Congress there has been a gradual surrender of power. The country, suffering from the cruel blows of the depression and more recently from the shock of war, has been bewildered, saddened, and angered, and, under pressure from here and pressure from there the Congress sometimes, I fear, not knowing just what to do and staggering under a burden the like of which the Congress had not earlier known, yielded its power, gave it up, sometimes with a show of resistance, sometimes with little resistance, always supposing, I assume, that one day when the clouds had passed, when a better time had come, Congress might recapture the power.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there are many men in high places who would take the powers of Congress for evil purposes, but I likewise know that there are few enough men in high places who are anxious to give back powers which they once obtain. Unless we do it now, I do not believe that we are going to recapture such of the constitutional powers of the Congress in respect to the making of treaties which we gave away in 1934.

A Senator said yesterday on the floor that he was an early adherent to the view I take, to the view of other Senators who have spoken in opposition to the joint resolution, but because we had come to the serious period of war he had changed his mind, and he thought that in wartime we should give up this power and place this treaty- and tariff-making authority in the executive department downtown.

Mr. President, I am going back a little bit in the record. I discussed this proposal at great length and with great seriousness in 1940. I discussed it at some length here in the Senate the other day. There were not many Senators then present. There are not many Senators now present, because Members of the Senate, suffering a pressure which Members of Congress have not heretofore known, are at this hour attending important committee meetings all over this building and in the Senate Office Building. I was compelled to abandon a committee meeting over which I presided in order to be here at 11 o'clock this morning. If I were meeting every obligation that is mine, I would at this moment be attending an Appropriations Committee meeting.

Mr. President, Senators cannot make a complete contribution to the responsibilities they have under the terrible pressure of war and depression, but this should be one time, as we deal with a great constitutional question, when we ought to have complete attention. Little by little, day by day, and month by month, we have surrendered our powers. How much, if any, we shall recapture I hesitate to predict; but I should like to point out, Mr. President, that we have given up more power than we realize.

Once it was the satisfactory feeling of the Members of Congress that they held, among other things, the power over the purse. That is no longer literally true. Within the past few days it has been brought boldly to our attention that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, of which Mr. Jesse Jones is Chairman, has appropriated more than $30,000,000,000 and has created dozens of corporations, without the specific approval of the Congress—an agency of government, a new agency of government, which, in my judgment, was set up to be a temporary agency, has appropriated more than $30,000,000,000. And the Congress has the power over the purse.

Where is the stopping place, Mr. President? Where is the danger sign? How far are we to go? I know, as does the distinguished Presiding Officer and as do all other Members of the Senate, there are other agencies of government which, without the direction or approval of Congress, make large appropriations and spend considerable sums of money. That was not the intention of the founding fathers, nor was the step the Senate now seems about to take at all close to the views of those men. I find no place in the records of the Constitutional Convention much debate on the subject of the ratification of treaties. There must have been a rather complete meeting of the minds of those men who, under divine direction, at Philadelphia a long time ago wrote into the Constitution the language which I now desire to use as an amendment to this all-important joint resolution.

In the debate yesterday a Senator to whom I have earlier referred, expressing a change of mind on this question, made a plea that we trust our Government, that we trust our Government in connection with this important joint resolution. That is all I ask. Who and what is the Government? Are we the representatives of the people? Are not we the Government, or a part thereof? Are we being trusted? Is not the entire question with which we are confronted one of a lack of trust in the Senate of the United States? Is it not a fact that we are asked to accept blindly, without even so much as having a chance to read them, trade treaties with nations all over the world? Who will deny that the man who has control over the economic life of this Government, or any other government, will long be without, if he desires it, political control over the life of the Government? Who will deny his influence on the political affairs of governments abroad, if he is able to wield great influence on the economic life of the nations abroad?

Mr. President, that is the question with which we are confronted. The fact is that there is not, on the part of some in the executive branch of Government, a trust in the Congress of the United States: that there is a lack of faith in the representatives of all the people of this country.

O, Mr. President, officials of the State Department, well informed as they are on international affairs and on what goes on in other lands, might better be informed, in my judgment, on what goes on here at home. I speak to them a word of warning. When they charge those of us opposed to the joint resolution with being economic aggressors, I say they take a dangerous step. Have we heard from any nation or statesman or diplomat abroad an expression of a feeling of fear, the like of which we hear from our own diplomatic officials? Has any Member of the Senate heard one word from any other nation expressing fear of us or of what our attitude might be after this war is over? Oh, no. I have heard no such fear expressed. I think all our allies and all the nations with whom we have entered into commercial treaties have faith in us. Excepting our enemies, the nations with whom we are now engaged in war, it seems to me that there has been a constant belief and faith in our generosity and in our anxiety and desire to help our neighbors everywhere on the globe.

Only in our own Government do we hear it said that unless the Members of Congress yield their views and their convictions, unless they march down the line for the pending joint resolution, they further threaten the economic tranquillity and the peace of the world. Should there come a darker day, should there later be an economic distress or misunderstanding, let it be said now that those who have expressed these fears and have made these predictions must assume the responsibility therefor.

Mr. President, I nearly forgot that I want to read a statement issued by the members of the Finance Committee of the Senate in the year 1929, when Mr. Hoover was President of the United States. The statement was offered in the Senate on October 3, 1929, by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. It reads as follows:

The joint statement by the minority members of the Senate Finance Committee reads as follows:

"A question of far-reaching consequence—

Let me say parenthetically that at that time the subject of treaties in reciprocity was under discussion in the Senate—transcending considerations of party prompts us to issue a public statement in relation to the socalled flexible provisions of the tariff bill now pending before the Senate.

"The question involved is one that in our opinion strikes at the very roots of constitutional government. It concerns the preservation unimpaired or the abandonment of the power of levying taxes by that branch of the Government which the forefathers agreed should alone be charged with that duty and responsibility.

"Whatever argument could be advanced during the war and immediately following for delegation to a degree of the taxing power to the Executive unquestionably no longer exists. To incorporate now in the law any recognition of a right of the Executive to impose taxes without the concurrence of the legislative branch is without justification.

"Authority in the Executive to make the laws that govern the course of commerce through taxation is especially objectionable. It is an entering wedge toward the destruction of a basic principle of representative government, for which the independence of the country was attained and which was secured permanently in the Constitution.

"There is no issue here as to the integrity of any Executive who has had or may have extended to him the exercise of this power. The issue is one of taxation by one official, be he president or monarch, in contrast to taxation by the representatives of the people elected, entrusted exclusively with the power to seize the property of the citizen through taxation. If proof be needed that the danger which the forefathers foresaw is inherent in this issue, a mere casual inquiry into the methods employed, selfish influences used, sinister schemes and contrivances brought to bear, one need but examine the record.

"PROCESS HELD VIRTUALLY SECRET

"The principle is: Are taxation laws and their application to be made virtually in secret, whatever may be said about a limiting rule, or are they to be enacted by the responsible representatives of the people in the Congress, where public debate is held and a public record made of each official's conduct?

"The arbitrary exercise of the taxing power, all the more dangerous if disguised and not obvious, in its basic character is tyranny. Resistance to the impairment of this popular right has largely occasioned many of the wars and revolutions of the past.

"An issue of this importance should not be associated with the opinions or necessities of those interests, States, or sections that directly profit by some rate schedule in the body of the tariff act. With respect to the principle here at stake any trading or logrolling is especially unjustifiable and indefensible. Neither should we be unduly influenced by the attempt to divert attention from this momentous issue by condemnation of and emphasis upon the dilatory and unsatisfactory results of congressional procedure.

"POINT TO AMENDMENTS

"No one seeks to prevent or in any way to interfere with the investigations and reports of the Tariff Commission in connection with emergency tariff legislation. The point is, we emphatically insist that final action and responsibility based on Tariff Commission reports shall be taken by the Congress.

"For the purpose of preventing apprehended congressional delay an amendment has been made providing for the submission of the reports to the Congress by the President, and furthermore, an amendment will be presented strictly limiting action by the Congress to matters germane to the particular subject matter or rates recommended by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission.

"We do not hesitate to say that if this extraordinary and what we believe to be unconstitutional authority passes now from the Congress, it is questionable if there will ever again be a tariff bill originated and enacted by the Congress.

"It is our solemn judgment that hereafter all taxation through the tariff and regulation of commerce thereby will be made by the Executive. It is the inherent tendency of this tariff-changing device and the apparently conscious purpose of its proponents to use it to keep the tariff out of Congress, where it is such an embarrassing business, as everybody knows, to the party that profits politically by it. So also it will be of distinct advantage to the interests that are the direct beneficiaries of the tariff.

"In an age where there has been a steady tendency to rob the individual citizen of his power and influence in his Government through bureaucracy, we deem it our duty to vigorously protest any further encroachments in this direction, and especially with respect to taxation.

"In the hope of arousing the people, regardless of party, to take a broad and public view of this important public question, we make this appeal.

"Furnifold M. Simmons, of North Carolina; Pat Harrison, of Mississippi; William H. King, of Utah; Walter F. George, of Georgia; David I. Walsh, of Massachusetts; Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky; Elmer Thomas, of Oklahoma; Tom Connally, of Texas."

Mr. President, that statement does not deal with exactly the same situation as confronts us now, but it deals with the same subject, and with the Constitution. I hope Senators will give it close attention. It was signed by eight distinguished Members of the United States Senate in 1929. Among them was the able and distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate [Mr. GEORGE]. There is no Member of the Senate for whom I have a higher regard or a more sincere and deep feeling of affection than I have for the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia. He was joined in signing that statement by other Senators who are here at this time, not the least of whom was the able and distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] who is chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate.

What has happened since that time, Mr. President? Congress has been in session for a long time, and Members of Congress are tired. There is an inclination, after one has been rowing upstream for a long time, subconsciously to yield to pressure—to yield to the temporary pressure of public opinion, not numerically great, but articulately expressed. But, Mr. President, I fear that if we surrender these powers now it will be a difficult task to regain them.

I hope—and I regret to say that it is no more than a hope—that Congress will take hold in connection with this all-important joint resolution. The language of the amendment is not my language. It is the language of the founding fathers, the language of men who had been close to the problems of the Old World, and who had taken plenty of time, after their rich experience, in the preparation of a document which is immortal, immortal unless we in a moment of carelessness or temporary weakness give up that for which men have died, and for which men are dying right now.

As I see it, this is the time of test. In a little while we shall come to the end of another terrible war. Following this war there ought to be a peace table. There should be a peace conference. It is all important that there be a treaty of peace. It is of paramount importance to me that the Senate of the United States, in keeping with its traditions and practices, and under the Constitution of the United States, be permitted to ratify that peace treaty.

Shall we continue a dangerous precedent? Shall we, to use a colloquialism, now count ourselves out, and thereby deny the more than 130,000,000 people of this country, who fight this war and who make the sacrifices, a voice in what transpires after the war? Cannot they be trusted in the making of treaties with other governments? Is it to be supposed that a treaty in which they have no voice can long be successful? Do Senators believe that a policy adopted without the approval and sanction of the American people can successfully endure? Mr. President, I am among those who doubt it.

I believe that the Constitution directs us in our responsibility. I think that judgment and common sense point out the path. I am as certain in my own mind as a man can be that we shall do ourselves and our country a disservice if we turn our backs on those who sent us here, if we close our eyes to the Constitution, and unless we now insist that these so-called reciprocal trade agreements are treaties and require ratification by a two-thirds vote of the United States Senate.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, as has every other Member of the Senate privileged to be present, I have listened with profit, enlightenment, and edification to the very earnest statement made by the Senator from Connecticut. I am in entire agreement with every statement he has made relative to the use or abuse, the utilization or destruction, of the treaty-making power. However, I cannot support the amendment which the Senator has offered to the pending measure.

While, of course, an international agreement, of necessity, has as its parties different nations, yet the pending proposal, in my humble judgment, is based upon a delegation of power which the Constitution has definitely placed in the Congress, the power to levy imposts, the power to levy duties, the power to regulate international commerce. That power can be delegated for administrative purposes, with certain standards, as our judiciary has repeatedly held. In this particular case I think the learned Senator is in error in attempting to consider the pending measure in the light of a treaty.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. With respect to the last expression by the able Senator from Iowa, we can do no less than consider these agreements in the light in which they are considered by the agency making them. The agency making these agreements regards them as treaties, by their very expression, because the most-favored-nation clause is inferentially, although not by act of Congress, written into every one of them. If we make a treaty with Brazil, Russia comes in and takes the benefits under the most-favored-nation clause.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator is absolutely true; but I wish to supplement his statement by referring to the fact that the treaty agreements, or agreements negotiated under this delegated power, have as their basis the purposes delineated and set out definitely in section 360 of the original act, which specifically covers the field of congressional authority to which I have referred.

Mr. President, yesterday I listened, as did many other Senators, to the superb address delivered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. Still I was unable to support his amendment, because I believed it administratively impossible. In the first sentence he uttered the Senator from Wyoming put his finger upon the sore spot in our international life at the present time. He stated that we were going through one of the severest crises this country has ever faced; and while he did not state it, his position could be expressed in three words—Government by usurpation. It is upon that subject, Mr. President, that I wish to address the Senate for a very few minutes. Because what I have to say is important to me, and should be said, and because it will probably subject me to criticism, I have had written down exactly what I have to say so that it cannot be used as an excuse by me that I spoke hastily and without mature consideration. I dictated what I have to say. I have reread it. The language was chosen carefully, and I mean every word of it as I shall now state it.

Anyone must be unusually dull and slow of perception who does not note throughout the Nation a mounting concern among our citizens relative to the almost daily evidence of contention among the coordinate branches of our Government on matters pertaining to fields of jurisdiction and authority. Our citizens would be fatuous indeed if they failed to read in these signs a possibility of serious threat to our future governmental tranquillity, both in the war and in the post-war periods. Scarcely a week passes that some Member of this body does not comment on this floor relative to the effect of some action taken by an executive agency, or some action proposed by way of legislation, and refer to these actions or proposals as unwarranted invasions of the rights of one of the three main branches of our Government by agencies of some other branch.

Let me be specific as to some of the more recent instances to which I refer. The Senate is now completing action on a bill designed to extend for 2 additional years the authority of the executive department to negotiate trade-agreement compacts with other nations. Some very learned and masterly addresses have been made in the debate on this measure and on certain amendments proposed to the joint resolution. The theme of every address which has been made in opposition to the measure was the suggested wisdom of keeping in the Congress a restrictive control or a veto power over the exercise by the executive department of powers delegated by the Congress in that proposed legislation.

A few weeks ago this Congress acted on legislation which made concessions to the Republic of Panama of certain property rights held by the United States of America. Numerous expressions of concern were heard on this floor during the consideration of that measure relative to the unwisdom of taking the action proposed other than by formal treaty negotiation and Senate ratification.

Within the past few months there has been a rapid increase in the tempo and volume of expressed concern over the general exercise of the treaty-making power, its incidence in the negotiation of treaties of peace at the conclusion of present hostilities, and the formulation of agreements looking to political, economic, and peace security in the post-war world. As Senators know, that concern was again expressed today. Again and again in these discussions there occurred expressions of great concern on the part of Senators lest in the establishment of these pacts one of the coordinate branches of our Government should proceed without the constitutional cooperation of the other branch concerned.

Allow me, in order to be even more specific in referring to incidents wholly of domestic concern, to invite attention to what I have in mind. Last fall this body was debating legislation of great economic importance to huge segments of our national industry. Senators had strongly held convictions on the proposals then pending and expressed those convictions in debate on this floor. I am referring to a particular proposal dealing with consumer price levels, as well as price levels for the production of raw materials. As the Senate was about to vote on the measure, the Vice President of the United States, sitting in his constitutional capacity as Presiding Officer of the Senate, presented and asked the clerk to read a letter from the President of the United States addressed to him, the Vice President, commenting and suggesting certain Senate action on the then-pending measure and, in effect, threatening to veto the proposal, if passed.

More recently, the Senate, after months of executive interposition, passed the Connally antistrike bill by a large majority vote. This bill was messaged to the House, and the House, through its appropriate committee, gave it full consideration and unanimously reported it favorably to the House for passage after adding some amendatory matter. The Rules Committee of the House granted a rule for its consideration by that body, and a time was set for its hearing on the floor of the House. But at this juncture, the heads of several executive agencies, having no more legislative authority in the matter than the Sultan of Sulu, joined in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in an obvious attempt to influence or block House action. So far as I am informed, these executive agents had neither asked nor been asked to appear before the appropriate committee and give their views on the legislation proposed, but had gratuitously and with consummate presumption injected themselves into the legislative picture through the letter to which I have just referred.

On the 24th day of May, during the week before last, the eminent Vice President of the United States, while presiding in his capacity as President of this body, laid before the Senate a letter from the President of the United States addressed to Mr. WALLACE as President of the Senate, and asked the clerk to read the letter to this body. The request was complied with, and the letter was read and appears in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 24, 1943, on page 4765. The letter referred to certain post-war plans and attached a draft of proposed legislation to accomplish certain things in relation to post-war planning.

Mr. President, I do not take exception to the proposal itself or its purpose. On the contrary, I believe that I find myself in agreement with most of the statements in that letter. But I strongly take exception to the manner, means, and method of its presentation.

The President of the United States has full constitutional right and full constitutional duty to communicate with the Congress on matters of public concern. But the method is particularly prescribed in the Constitution itself, and that method is not by letter addressed to the Presiding Officer of this body or the presiding officer of either branch of the Congress. The Vice President is not a Member of the Senate. He has no right of voice in its debates. He has no vote in this body, except in one carefully described situation. He cannot take the floor to demand recognition, the right of voice, or participation in the discussions of this body. He has no right to present for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD any documents excepting such as are proper, such as official messages, reports, and communications received and presented through the regular channels. I did not raise objection when the letter was presented on May 24, because I realized that the Presiding Officer was acting in the best of faith and intention. But I give notice here and now that if ever again there is an attempted repetition of action to lay before the Senate letters addressed to other than the Members of the Senate and presented by other than the Senators themselves, I shall make a point of order against such effort and attempt.

Mr. President, during the few years I have served in the Senate, I have been assiduous in trying as best I could to protect the jurisdiction and authority of each of the associated branches of our Government from encroachment on or invasion by the activities of another branch. In the remaining months that

I shall be permitted to serve, I shall, as best I can, be as meticulous in opposition to any similar attempts in the future. The founding fathers brought out of the chaos of political opinion and contention a document which proposed to keep the lines of demarcation of the fields of executive, legislative, and judicial governmental authority well established, well marked, and well delineated.

They planned with superlative wisdom to keep these respective jurisdictional authorities so balanced one against the other that they could and would serve as a check on usurpation or assumption of authority by any one branch whereby and wherefrom could come any abuse of power which had been delegated to that particular branch from the great repository of power, the American people.

When, a few years ago, it seemed that there was a threat against the supreme judiciary power from the executive branch of the Government, I, as well as many other Members of this body, strenuously opposed such action. When, a few years ago, there appeared what to me was an attempt by the legislative branch to encroach on the clear prerogatives of the Executive in certain appointments of influential officials, I opposed this encroachment by the legislative, even though it involved an opportunity for me to pay a personal debt of resentment. Never will I wittingly be a party either by acquiescence or by concrete approval to attempted expansion of power either in the legislative, the executive, or the judicial branches of our Government by usurpation, encroachment, invasion, or assumption of authority not clearly granted by the Constitution or conferred by proper delegation of power from the chosen constitutional repository.

Mr. President, the first section of the first article of the Constitution and the very first sentence of that Federal document secured legislative authority before another word was added. The importance of legislative control was explicitly asserted. I quote the first sentence:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

No other agency has initial legislative power or authority of any kind, unless such authority has come by the proper delegation of such power from the body where the Constitution has so clearly placed it—the Congress of the United States.

But there are two outstanding functions to be performed by the Executive in legislative matters. One of these functions antedates and one of them postdates the enactment of a law by the American Congress. Section 3 of article II provides—and again I quote from this well-known provision—

He—

shall from time to time—

Now listen—

He—

The President—

shall from time to time give to the Congress—

What is the Congress? The Senate and the House of Representatives—give to Congress information on the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration—

Again I ask the Senate to listen—recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Iowa on the amendment has expired. He has 30 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. GILLETTE. I shall take about 5 minutes on the joint resolution.

Please note, Mr. President, that these messages on the state of the Union and recommendations of measures for passage are to be made to the Congress in a formal message addressed to both branches, not to one branch of the Congress, and certainly not by letters mailed to the Presiding Officers or party leaders in either branch. Furthermore these messages are to be addressed to the Congress with all the dignity and purpose of a message from the Chief Executive, outlining and delineating the Nation's situation and needs from the Executive viewpoint.

Not by the remotest stretch of imagination could or should this provision be used to bring the Executive or his agents into participation in legislative debate or to attempt to influence the course of pending legislation by unsought advice, by threat of disapproval, or by any other type of pressure during the course of legislative consideration. It is interesting to note also that even a recommendation as to legislation is limited by this constitutional provision to affirmative action, to Executive suggestions for consideration by the Congress of such measures "as he shall judge necessary and expedient," and not by way of opposition to proposals pending before the Congress and against their enactment. If the Executive opposes a legislative proposal, his constitutional interposition comes only after the Congress has passed a bill, when if he approves the measure he affixes his signature and it becomes law; if he does not approve, the alternative courses of action for him are definite and specific—to allow the bill to become law without his signature or to return the bill, together with his objections, to the Congress for further action.

Mr. President, I have often thought of this tremendous power of veto which under our organic document is vested in and wielded by a President of the United States, in a democracy where the people are exercising their will to legislate on matters of public weal through representatives of their own choosing, where, under equality of representation and under full and open debate, discussion, and opportunity of amendment, a measure has merited and received the approval of a majority of the people's delegates, not in one branch alone, Mr. President, but after committee and floor consideration by both the Senate and the House and the recording of their approval by a formal vote.

What a tremendous responsibility is this, Mr. President, when one man's judgment is to be registered against this volume of considered opinion and majority approval. But, far more than this, such judgment by veto not only negates and displaces the weight of majority opinion referred to, but, in effect, becomes paramount and controlling and equal in efficacy and potency to one less than two-thirds of the membership of both the Senate and the House.

It is wholly reasonable to suppose, then, that a Chief Executive would, and I am sure that he does, take such veto action only after the most careful and prayerful searching for guidance of his judgment. But the power is his, Mr. President, and the duty is his, and whenever a President, in the performance of that duty, has reached a conclusion which places his individual judgment in the scales to outweigh the deliberate judgment of a majority of the people's legal representatives in the legislative branch, I for one have always been ready and willing to reexamine with extreme care the law proposed and to scrutinize most carefully and reconsider my own judgment and conclusion, in the light of the findings of the Chief Executive. I have on occasion, after such reexamination, reversed my position on a bill, in the light furnished by the Chief Executives' findings. But, Mr. President, with the constitutional right and the constitutional duty to exercise this stupendous power of veto after the legislative body has acted, would it not seem that this overwhelming, overriding power should suffice a Chief Executive, without attempting to exercise power that does not exist by attempting to interpose, influence, and participate in the legislative debates themselves by invading the field of clear constitutional definition vested wholly in the legislative branch?

I do not assume, Mr. President, that the fathers of our Constitution reached the zenith of human wisdom when they framed that document, but until the people of this great Nation, through the methods devised and provided, change the provisions of our basic and organic law, I shall oppose, with all the vigor I possess, every action in any department which, in my honest judgment, attempts to invade, encroach upon, seize, usurp, or dominate by any branch of our Government a field of authority which has been constitutionally vested in another.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY].

So Mr. MALONEY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on the desks of Senators will be found an amendment which I now offer to the pending joint resolution.

At the proper place in the joint resolution I propose to insert the following:

No foreign trade agreement hereafter entered into under the authority delegated to the President by such section 350, as amended, no amendatory or supplementary agreement hereafter entered into under such section, and no duties and other import restrictions specified in a proclamation issued by the President to carry out any such foreign trade agreement or any such amendatory or supplementary agreement, shall take effect if the Congress by concurrent resolution has specifically disapproved such agreement and the duties and other import restrictions so specified to carry out such agreement, within 60 days after such agreement has been laid before the Congress.

Mr. President, I shall not take a great deal of time in discussing the amendment because not much time is necessary. In the beginning I wish to make a correction of a typographical error in the amendment. On page 1, line 5 of the amendment I ask that the word "important" be stricken out, and that the word "import" be inserted in its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The correction will be made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] yesterday, would require affirmative approval by the Congress before a reciprocal trade agreement or treaty, whatever one may wish to call it, could become effective. I agree with the proponents of the measure that that method would slow up the process of making treaties. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] which the Senate has just rejected, could be open to the same objection. My amendment, Mr. President, is not open to that objection. All the amendment does is to provide that no foreign trade agreement, and no amendatory or supplemental agreement, and no duties and other import restrictions, shall become effective if the Congress, by concurrent resolution, shall specifically disapprove them within 60 days after they have been laid before the Congress. That is the very minimum of control the Congress should exert and retain. That would not cause any delay or any confusion in the making of the agreements. No agreement would need to wait for affirmative action before it became effective.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The thing which bothers me concerning the Senator's amendment is precisely the same thing which bothers me concerning the so-called O'Mahoney amendment. Let me ask the Senator a question: If we should agree to his amendment providing for the process of House and Senate action on these agreements, would we not confess in the statute that these agreements are not treaties?

Mr. REED. I have no such intention.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is that not what we would do?

Mr. REED. I think not. In answer to the Senator from Michigan I will say that at least I am seeking to retain in the Congress of the United States some vestige of authority to reject or approve trade agreements. All of us who live between the Missouri River and the Sierra Nevada Mountains or the Coast Range near the Pacific, know how uneasy a great segment of our people are as to the possibility of treaties or agreements being made which might do our people great damage, and cause great injury without an opportunity being afforded the Congress of the United States to reject such agreements if it desired to do so. All my amendment seeks to do is to provide 60 days in which the Congress may by a concurrent resolution disapprove such agreements.

On my amendment, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not care to argue the pending amendment. It represents the fight against the effort to make a tariff by any method other than the old log-rolling method. The same objections have been urged, and the same position has been taken by all those who have opposed every effort to make progress in the difficult matter of tariff making. If the proposed amendment were adopted, it would, of course, mean that any agreement which was negotiated, or even any modification of an agreement which had already been negotiated, would come to the Senate and lie here for 60 days, and become immediately the subject matter of debate, indeed, of constant debate, and all the progress which has been made would be lost.

I do not care to argue the question. I do care to state that, of all times on earth, those who are opposing the renewal of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act have chosen the time that cannot be defended before the bar of public opinion in this country. The proposal is to renew the act for but 2 years. In the meantime an election will intervene, and if then it is desired to go back to the old methods that invite corruption in tariff making, Senators will be privileged to do so. However, I desire to say to those Members of the Senate who now urge one after another, amendments intended to defeat and to end the operation of the act that they have chosen most unwisely the time in which to make their case, because the American people know and understand perfectly well that if the American Congress now is to take a backward step in this single field of international trade and commerce, it is intended thereby to serve notice upon the world that we are prepared to scuttle and run.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator from Georgia think that this question arises by the inexorable march of time and because the current authority extended by the act of Congress expires on the 30th day of this month? At what other time, in heaven's name, would those of us who have views upon the subject, those of us who desire to express opinions, those of us who think some modification might be wise, bring it up, except now?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I let my former statement stand, in answer to the Senator's inquiry. I am confident that the American people know that this is not the proper time to raise this issue. With all but five of the trade agreements already having run for 3 years, and with little possibility that any general trade agreements can be concluded with any country during the last days of this war or in the period in which the world now finds itself, why bring up the issue? I think the record is made; all those who want to oppose the act, all those who do oppose it—and I can understand why Senators may oppose the act—have made their record. Why persist in the effort to kill the act? Why continue to present amendments designed and intended to kill an act which can do this country no real harm, and at the same time take a step which at this time may do this country immeasurable damage in the eyes of the world?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there is just one thing the able senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] said upon which I wish to comment because it has been stated repeatedly throughout this debate that to the extension of the Trade Agreements Act there is no alternative in tariff making except a return to the old log-rolling methods of general congressional revision. I say that is just not so. There is no such limitation upon the alternatives. The fact of the matter is that the existing tariff law provides a so-called elastic tariff which is administered in the first instance by experts of the United States Tariff Commission, and is administered in the last recourse by the President of the United States, acting under the recommendations of the Tariff Commission. It has not any relationship to the old-fashioned log-rolling methods.

A decade ago I myself, sat through one general congressional revision of the tariff, and I hope to heaven I shall never have to sit through another. I can think of no Senator on this floor who would be more bitterly opposed to the old, so-called log-rolling congressional methods of tariff revision than I would be. I believe completely in the theory of the elastic tariff. I believe completely in permitting the Executive to act under the elastic tariff, because the elastic tariff prescribes a definite cost-of-production rule to guide the Tariff Commission and the President in the administration of the act.

I simply want to protest against the wholly empty pretense that any man who is opposed to any phase of the Trade Agreements Act necessarily, ipso facto, thereby becomes a partisan and a defender of the old congressional log-rolling methods.

I happen to be opposed to the amendment submitted by the Senator the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REED], because I think it is a statutory confession that we have ceased to look upon trade agreements as treaties. So far as I am concerned, I have a deep constitutional conviction that they are treaties. Therefore, I shall vote against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kansas.

However, in view of the fact that the statement to which I have referred has again been renewed, I take advantage of this opportunity to insist that we do not face the alternatives that have been held up to us. One can disagree to the delegation to the State Department of almost the total tariff power, and can still believe in a scientific tariff, scientifically made by a scientific United States Tariff Commission administered by the President of the United States, all acting under specific rules and yardsticks created by the Congress under the Constitution.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I have not thus far taken part in the debate. I do not desire to return to the old method of enacting tariff legislation. I believe in trade agreements. I voted for two of the amendments submitted to this body by Members of the Senate. I voted for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY]. I did so because I feel that the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, constituting the Congress, are just as desirous of having good will, in bringing about good understanding, as any other branch of the Federal Government possibly can be. I am not one of those who believe that honesty of purpose and sincerity of purpose prevail only in the executive branch of the Government. I, for one, have a great deal in common with the people outside the United States who will be affected by this legislation, and I will not defer to any member of the State Department or of any other agency of the executive branch of the Government in the desire to have good understandings and trade agreements which will be beneficial to the people of both countries.

However, it is my fundamental conviction that, after all, the Congress of the United States has a constitutional duty to perform; and I believe that it should perform that duty. We should not act under the assumption that, in order to perform that duty, in order to show that we are seeking good will, in order to show that we are in favor of reciprocal trade agreements, we must have someone in the State Department perform our duty.

I believe that we are a part of the Government. I am in favor of reciprocal trade agreements. I shall vote for the joint resolution; but I still insist that when an amendment is offered in this body in good faith by any Senator, the Senators who vote for such an amendment should not be accused of being against the objective which is sought to be obtained by the joint resolution. I am for the joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion to vote in favor of extension of the Trade Agreements Act for the duration of the war, but with the expectation that after the war there will be a strong movement for the restoration of the democratic rather than the autocratic method of regulating tariff rates. My reason for this course of action is that I am opposed to any interruptions in our relations with foreign countries while we are still engaged in the war.

I think the claim made that failure to extend these trade agreements without amendments would be injurious or harmful to the war effort or the writing of peace terms thereafter, is exaggerated. However, in view of the fact that very few, if any, such trade agreements can be made while the war is in progress, I have decided to support the pending measure. As was suggested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the subject of our international trade is largely an academic one for the duration.

I wish to have it clearly understood, however, that in voting for the extension of the Trade Agreements Act at this time, I do not intend to be understood as committing myself to a continuation of this law after the war is ended. I also intend to vote against amendments that will tend to embarass the negotiators during the next 2 years, but I shall vote for amendments that represent a principle I have voted for in the past.

I assume that the wisdom, or unwisdom of continuing this policy will depend upon conditions which confront our country and the world when hostilities cease. Indeed, I anticipate that after the war is ended there will be a strong move in this country in favor of recording congressional sanction to these treaties. I anticipate a growing opposition—it is here now, as this debate shows—to permitting any bureau or department of the Government to exercise absolute authority to negotiate trade treaties which may spell life or death for various domestic industries and in time lower the wages of labor and reduce our present standards of living.

Under the Constitution, these trade agreements are, in fact, treaties requiring Senate ratification; and in my opinion, a large element of our people will urge that this policy be restored after the war.

It is impossible to make these national trade agreements by the State Department or by the Congress without some injustices being done and without some industries in this country being more or less seriously affected. The difference, however, between the two methods is this: The injustice in one instance is done by a bureau removed from the control of the people, and the aggrieved party has little opportunity to be heard, and if heard, it is largely behind closed doors. If, through congressional action, an injury is inflicted upon a particular industry or section of the country, the people have an opportunity to have their case presented to their chosen representatives, to have hearings held and the whole question pro and con thrashed out in the open by the Representatives of the people in their Congress.

In other words, they have an opportunity to employ democratic process to obtain relief in one case, and in the other, they are at the mercy of bureaucrats who are not elected by the people, and not directly responsible to the people or the chosen representatives of the people in their Congress. An appeal for relief under the present system practically makes Members of Congress unable to redress wrongs inflicted on their constituents; and every Member of this body knows it.

Because I look for the rebirth of constitutional government and the restoration of congressional powers in the United States following the war, I feel certain that there will be a strong movement to restore to the Congress, with all its shortcomings in dealing with tariffs—and they are many—all the powers of government which have been bestowed upon it by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it had not been my intention to make any remarks upon the issues involved in the pending joint resolution and the amendments which have been offered or may be offered thereto before it comes to a final vote.

I was a Member of the United States Senate at the time the Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration. I think it is no exaggeration to say that I had an active part in organizing the so-called coalition in the Senate which for 8 months attempted to prevent the excessive rates adopted by the House from being enacted into law. I think I learned something from that experience.

Mr. President, it is my considered judgment that those who support and advocate the joint resolution and the policy it is intended to continue are not serving the cause of democracy when they attempt to smear those who disagree with them.

There will be reactions in this country as a result of this war. I fear that they may be violent reactions; I trust that they may not be blind reactions. If democracy is to survive, those who wield power must exercise tolerance. They must accord to those who disagree with them the honesty and sincerity of purpose which they claim for themselves.

I have seen Congress strip itself of power until today it is largely a rubber stamp. It has even lost control of the purse strings, as was stated by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY]. I do not think it lies in the mouth of any Senator to charge other Senators who disagree with him, and who desire to see some check placed upon the executive power, with a desire to return to an era of corruption. So far as I am concerned, I shall let my record in the fight which I made with Senators who are members of the Democratic Party against the excesses of the Smoot-Hawley tariff stand as an answer to any such charge.

I firmly believe that the statements made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] in his speech of yesterday will grow in import as the history of the near future unrolls and reveals itself. Unless Congress has the courage to stand up and fight for its own power and its own prerogatives, how can it expect either the country or the executive branch of the Government to respect it?

Mr. President, so long as we had the power over the purse strings we had power to require an accounting as to the conduct of executive policy; but by the appropriations of the huge sums of money which have been made by this Congress, and with the power of Federal corporations to draw upon the credit of the United States, the Congress has no longer control over the purse strings. Every student of history knows that the relinquishment of power over the purse strings will bring about the death of representative government.

Mr. President, I have cast my votes upon the amendments which have been offered, and I shall cast my vote upon the pending joint resolution, in the firm conviction that the preservation of democracy at this time demands that Congress should guard its power and not relinquish it further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. REED]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PEPPER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS]. If he were present he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. REVERCOMB (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. If he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." As I intend to vote the same way, I am free to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] are absent from the Senate because of illness. I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on imcause of illness. I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] are detained in important committee meetings.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], who is absent on public business, is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I am advised that if present and voting the Senator from Utah would vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], who would, if present, vote "yea," is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who would vote "nay."

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BUCK] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who is necessarily absent, has a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 49, as follows:

So Mr. REED'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I have heretofore had printed and which is on the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 8, after the numerals "1943", it is proposed to insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no commodity or article shall be included in any foreign trade agreement entered into which permits the entry into American markets of products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid, which total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive products of American workers, miners, or farmers where such American products are commercially available."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for any great length of time. It is quite apparent that, notwithstanding the merit of any amendment it has been decreed that it shall not go into the pending joint resolution. I believe the day will come when the Congress of the United States will come to the realization that, after all, we do represent a democratic constitutional form of government. I think the sooner that day arrives the sooner we will assure the perpetuity of the Government that was instituted 160 years ago. The more we delay that hour, the more we invite the tearing down of that fine form of government that has carried us through troubled waters for more than a century and a half.

If there is anything we are fighting for in this war today, it is the American way of living; if there is anything that spells the American way of living it is the American standard of living for those who toil in America. If, in passing the pending joint resolution, we delegate to executive agencies the power to forget and to ignore everything that pertains to the differential between the standard of the living of American toilers and the standard of living of those who serve in peonage in other countries—if, I say, by the passage of this joint resolution we hand over to others authority to forget and ignore that differential, then, indeed, it seems to me that the Senate of the United States has been recreant to its greatest obligation.

I hope, Mr. President, this war is not being fought to gain great fortunes for certain groups and certain men. I rather hope that it is being waged so that men who toil, men who work, men who belong to the toiling masses of this country, and women also, shall know that when the war is over they will not be placed in such a position that they will be forced to compete with peon and slave labor and discouraged humanity in every corner of the globe.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would it be fair to say that all the Senator's amendment proposes to do is to require that trade-agreement tariffs shall be measured by the same statutory yardstick—namely, the cost of production—which already is required by law to be applied under the elastic section of the tariff law?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think the Senator, by and large, states the thought expressed in the amendment. I wish to call to the attention of those Members of the Senate who do us the honor to listen that at the close of the last World War there were turned onto the markets of America nearly a hundred million dollars worth of commodities which were either fabricated or in course of fabrication; nearly $100,000,000 worth of commodities manufactured at the expense of this Government were turned loose upon the markets of this country. The quantity of goods thus thrown on the market following World War No. 1 cannot be compared to the quantity which will face American markets at the close of World War No. 2, because what we expended in the war effort in World War No. 1 was a mere fraction of what we will expend in the war in which we are now engaged. So the commodities which, after this war, will be thrown loose on American markets, without cost figured into them, will naturally tear down our own labor standards, because they will tear down our own facilities for manufacturing even at the cost of production.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to finish this sentence, if I may, and then I shall yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I realize the Senator's time is limited and I do not care to interrupt him unduly.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let us go a little further and bring into the picture the other countries and the other peoples that will be producing and seeking to find a market here for commodities produced by peon labor. Take the two and combine them and what is the result?

We speak of our boys struggling for a continuation of the American way of life. If our boys are not struggling for a continuation of an uprise, and a continual uprise, in the way of life of the toilers, then they are not struggling for anything, because the toilers constitute the red blood not only of America but of every other country in the world. It is the workers who constitute the vitality of a nation; and when we say that we will not recognize the cost of production here, with labor at American standards figured in, then, indeed, we have forgotten the very thing for which in the first place our Government was instituted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Missouri asked me to yield, and I yield first to him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Nevada about the thought he was expressing as to the necessity for writing specific tariff regulations into a formula of the sort we are now considering. In other words, when the Senator undertakes to write in a specific tariff stipulation, he is going back to the Smoot-Hawley law in its entirety, so far as the flexible provisions are concerned, is he not?

Mr. McCARRAN. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not wish to take the Senator's time for any debate with him, because I realize he is under a time limit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps the Senator from Nevada can answer the question I desire to propound at the same time he answers the other question.

Mr. McCARRAN. I hope I can.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am wondering how this amendment could be made into a workable provision. It seems to me there would be a great deal of difficulty in working out such a proposal. I can see merit in what the Senator says, but I do not see how it could be very well worked out.

Mr. McCARRAN. If the Tariff Commission cannot work it out, then indeed I am wondering how our armed forces will work it out; I am wondering how America will work it out. It seems to me that the Congress of the United States—and I say this without at all attempting to be captious—can well afford to write a prescriptive value of American labor into a measure so vital as the one now before the Senate.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I do not wish to take the Senator's time, which is limited, but I desire to call his attention to the fact that after the First World War ended we had 20,000,000 pounds of sugar in France, as I recall. It was dumped over there at 2 cents a pound, while we were paying 20 cents a pound in this country. So we have not been very kind to our own people in some of our war operations.

I should like to ask the Senator whether the language I am about to suggest might not be important in his amendment. I should not want to keep out of the country commodities of which, by reason of restricted output by some of the monopoly operations, there was not an adequate supply here. Suppose the Senator should add to his amendment a sentence at the end, because of his use of the term "commercially available," which is rather vague, in these words, "in quantities reasonably adequate to normal needs and requirements." I do not want to pay 50 cents for something which could be reasonably produced for 10 cents, merely because some outfit has a monopoly. I will ask the Senator to look at the language. I think the American public has a right to protection against monopoly prices and restricted output, and the language suggested would not harm the Senator's amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Let me say to the able Senator from Washington that I think his suggestion would void the whole amendment. The purpose and object of the amendment is to hold the life of American toilers and American laborers at such a level that it can sustain itself under American standards. What we are going to be confronted with, if my analysis of the situation is at all correct, is twofold. First of all, a great mass of American-produced commodities will be thrown onto the American market, then a great mass of people in foreign countries will be engaged in production at what I call peonage wages; in other words, under conditions which are substandard.

Mr. BONE. We would have adequate supplies, then, if our own people could produce the goods. My suggestion is to apply only in a case where there is no adequate or reasonable supply of a commodity in the United States. If there is such a supply, Americans should produce the commodity. We will have the labor to produce it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator from Nevada will yield to me under his time limit I shall be glad to let the Senator occupy a portion of my time.

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, the Senator knows that all the provisions of the hitherto existing law, all the provisions which have been in effect as to dumping, still remain in effect under the trade agreements. All the antidumping provisions of any of our laws are still in effect under the reciprocal trade agreements. It seems to me that what the Senator is driving at is the question of dumping.

Mr. McCARRAN. Not necessarily. Dumping is only one phase of the question. The question is larger than dumping. We have always tried to keep American labor on an American standard. We cannot keep American labor on an American standard if we put American labor in competition with peonage labor abroad. Today we have that in a limited form in other countries which are now dealing with us, because they are not affected by the war. In other words, South American countries are sending here their commodities. Would we allow them to come in and tear down American standards of living? If we lower the bars entirely, so that there is no protection whatever to American labor, then I can only see that American labor by millions upon millions will again face the unfortunate condition which prevailed in 1932, when a large segment of American labor was on the dole. I do not believe in the dole. I do not believe that American labor wants the dole. I do not believe the toilers of America want anything more or less than an opportunity to work. If given an opportunity to work and to sustain those who are dependent upon them, American labor will carry American life forward, even through the crises which will confront us after the war. But what will result if, on the other hand, we say to American toilers, "Yes, you may send your sons to fight and die abroad; yes, you may go yourselves into war activities; yes, you may do everything you think is essential for this war, but when the war is over millions upon millions of people in foreign countries for which you are now fighting, and for which your sons are now dying, will be put into a condition enabling them to produce commodities by the thousands of tons and dump them onto American markets, to tear down American standards of living, and the American wage earner's right to an American standard of living."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Idaho in the chair). The time of the Senator from Nevada on the amendment has expired.

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall occupy the time of the Senate for only a moment longer, because I know what the fate of the amendment will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 30 minutes on the joint resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, we are today dealing with a measure which will have a place in history, in my judgment. A similar joint resolution has been passed on two previous occasions, and the one now pending will be passed today. I shall vote against the joint resolution, as I have heretofore voted against similar measures. I shall vote against it for at least two reasons. One is that in my judgment we would be setting aside the specific mandate of the organic law of this country. The Congress of the United States can never again ask this country to sustain it when the Congress itself refuses to sustain the law which gave the Congress its place in this Government. We cannot complain, if we pass the pending joint resolution, that agencies in the executive branch of the Government, or other branches of the Government, are usurping Congressional functions, when we ourselves let down the bars, refuse to accept the responsibility and the toil involved and say to the world, "Yes, we know that every treaty must be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, but, knowing that, we set it aside."

The able Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] says that the hour, the time, the day in which we live, afford the greatest argument for setting aside this constitutional mandate. If the Constitution of the United States is so weak that the existence of any emergency can be made the basis for setting aside one of its specific mandates, then the day may only be tomorrow when we shall set aside all constitutional provisions, simply because someone may announce that it is the day, it is the hour, it is the time when we must forget the mandate of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I know there is a difference of opinion with respect to what the mandate of the Constitution is, but under my oath of office, and under my duty in observing my oath, I shall vote for the pending amendment, first of all, because its adoption will mean the uplift of my people, it will mean the continuation of the toiling masses of our country in a safe and secure American way of life. I shall vote against the joint resolution because the Constitution of the United States provides that every treaty must be ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. That being a provision of the Constitution, I have never been able to make myself believe that the Senate can grant a delegation of that power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McCARRAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN].

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, the Senator from Missouri desires to say a few words on the amendment. I think I should do so, also, because of the unusual character of the amendment.

The amendment provides—

> That no commodity or article shall be included in any foreign trade agreement entered into which permits the entry into American markets of products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid, which total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive products of American workers, miners, or farmers where such American products are commercially available.

Mr. President, the amendment would go far beyond any theory which is actually involved in the present tariff act. I call attention to the fact that the amendment would prohibit a trade agreement which permitted the entry into the United States of any article at a landed cost lower than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive domestic products where such American products were commercially available. It is plain that the amendment would remove every possible element of price competition in the United States, so far as imported products are concerned. If Senators will examine the amendment, they will see that it would require that the landed cost of all competitive imports be not less than the selling price of domestic goods. The Senate should note well that the comparison would be between the landed cost and the domestic price. No margin would be permitted with which a dealer in imported goods could pay the expenses of the business of selling such goods at wholesale.

Where would the comparison be made? It necessarily would be made in the highest-priced market, not in the principal market. Why? Because under the Constitution the duties must be uniform throughout the United States. If the amendment were written into the law, we should have to make the comparison with the wholesale selling price in the very highest-priced market in the United States in order to comply with the provision of the Constitution relating to the fixing of uniform duties.

Now, let us see what would happen. In simple terms, the amendment would require that duties be adjusted on a basis to prevent any price competition, even in the highest-priced market in the United States. Could any tariff be more destructive of the consumer and more satisfying to those who wish a complete monopoly of the American market? Of course, it would be impossible to negotiate any foreign trade agreement with this provision written into the law because the United States would have nothing whatever to offer for the paring down of any unreasonable trade, monetary, or quota restrictions.

What would this amendment do if it were adopted? I wish to make it plain. It would put into the hands of the American producer the power to raise his tariffs as he might see fit. If he were in the highest market, all he would have to do would be to raise his prices, and that would call for a rise in the tariff, because under this amendment, as I have said, the highest market in the United States must be taken as a basis. What would that do in a case in which one concern might control production and distribution, or a case in which a group of closely affiliated concerns might control all production and distribution in certain lines? It would mean absolute monopoly because the producers themselves would have the power to continue to raise their wholesale selling prices and demand that the tariff rates go up. There could be no importations into the United States.

So, Mr. President, with all due respect to my friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], I hope that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, this debate has taken a very remarkable course from beginning to end. We have had no attack from any quarter fundamentally on the principle of the reciprocal trade agreements, but we have had amendments offered, any one of which would have been calculated to destroy the whole principle of reciprocal trade agreements; and, strangely enough, some of them were absolutely antagonistic to each other. However, we have had essentially the same vote in behalf of all these amendments, antagonistic as they may be. From the very same group of Senators we have had the same vote for each one of these amendments, any one of which would destroy the effect of the whole Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

We had the amendment of my very able and distinguished friend, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], which was in absolute antagonism to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY]; yet the same group of Senators voted for both amendments.

Mr. President, if the agreements authorized to be continued by the joint resolution are treaties, as was suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, then they should become the supreme law of the land, as is provided by the Constitution for treaties. They do not need the action of the House of Representatives. They do require a vote of two-thirds of the Senate. They become the supreme law of the land, which, in good faith, cannot be changed by statute.

So Senators might conceive of these agreements as treaties, and logically vote for a provision for ratification by the Senate. On the other hand, they might be considered as legislation, as provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming. In that case, of course, it would be a duplication for Congress to make the authorization under strict limits, but that would be a perfectly logical position.

Mr. President, I assert that no Senator could have logically voted on one constitutional theory for the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming and also for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Since the Senator from Missouri has made that statement, I rise to call attention to the fact that a very distinguished American statesman, who by many of us is now called the founder of the Democratic Party—I refer to Thomas Jefferson—found no such logical contradiction as the Senator from Missouri now finds in a similar situation. I have no hesitation in saying that the Senator from Missouri is one of the greatest students of history in America.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I appreciate that compliment from my distinguished friend from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. He knows, probably in much greater detail than I the story of the Louisiana Purchase. I am merely reminding him that Thomas Jefferson, as President of the United States, consummated the Louisiana Purchase; and when that had been completed, he sent a letter to some of his congressional leaders. In his letter he pointed out that two powers of Congress were involved. He said that not only would there have to be Senate ratification of the treaty by which the purchase was made, but that there would also have to be action by Congress as a whole in support of it. What finally evolved was that the treaty was ratified by the Senate; and the House and Senate combined in making the appropriation which was necessary to complete the purchase. When President Jeffereson wrote to his Minister abroad, he had authority from Congress only to purchase New Orleans, and, as I understand, the sum involved was only about $2,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me to answer what the Senator from Wyoming has said, I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I have spent most of my life reading the writings, speeches, and messages of Thomas Jefferson. I have three different sets, each purporting to be the complete writings of Thomas Jefferson. As I say, I have spent most of my life reading those documents. I am bound to say that from Jefferson's standpoint, great logician and facile writer that he was, the most difficult operation he ever had in his life was in reconciling his powers to execute the treaty involving the purchase of Louisiana with his subsequent submission of the issue to Congress. I say that very frankly; but I think that President Jefferson made a very excellent adjustment of that problem, at least in his own mind—and, it seems to me, to the mind of posterity. But that does not seem to me to have anything to do with the pending question.

Yesterday the Senator from Wyoming asserted that this was a matter for legislation by Congress.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator in a moment.

Yesterday the Senator from Wyoming asserted that this was a matter for legislation by Congress, and he very properly voted for his own amendment. Today the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] asserted that it was not a matter of statute—which, of course, congressional legislation is—but that it was a matter of treaty, requiring a vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

If it is a question of regulation by statute, as asserted by the Senator from Wyoming, the Senator certainly cannot agree that the Senator from Connecticut was correct today when he said it was a treaty requiring a two-thirds vote of the Senate, because, Mr. President, the treaty process and the statutory process are mutually antagonistic to each other.

The President does not require any authority from the Congress to negotiate a treaty. Under the Constitution he has authority to negotiate a treaty at any time he pleases, and when the treaty comes from the Executive it does not require joint action of the House and the Senate. It requires a two-thirds majority of the Senate in order to be ratified, and if ratified it thereupon becomes the supreme law of the land.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to yield if the Senator from Nevada will wait until I finish the comparison which I am trying to make.

As I said, it becomes the supreme law of the land. Under the Constitution it is coordinate with the Constitution itself. A Federal statute, of course, can be changed by this or any future Congress.

Therefore, I say that anyone who asserts that this matter is to be regulated by statute is in inevitable antagonism with one who asserts it is a treaty which becomes a part of the supreme law of the land and requires ratification by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am under obligation to yield first to the Senator from Nevada.

I have no quarrel with any Senator who adheres to the view of the Senator from Wyoming that this is a statutory matter. I certainly have no quarrel with any Senator who adheres to the view of the Senator from Connecticut who asserts that a trade agreement is a treaty, and, therefore, requires a different procedure. But I cannot understand the mental process of anyone who can possibly vote for both the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming and the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, and, still less, how he can then vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. In regard to the action of President Jefferson, to which the Senator has made reference, the Senator will recall that President Jefferson did submit the matter to the Congress, and that he had the Congress thereafter. The Senator will further recall the language of President Jefferson, when he said that the emergency of the hour demanded that the Executive act, and that if thereafter the Congress to which he submitted the question did not approve his action, that was a matter for Congress. In other words, he never lost sight of his Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did he submit it? Did he submit it as a treaty, or in the form of legislation making effective certain regulations which the President saw fit to make in pursuance of the treaty with France?

Mr. McCARRAN. He submitted it in the form of an Executive act for the approval of Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. What I wish to emphasize to the Senator—and he will immediately recognize it—is that Jefferson did not lose sight of his Congress. He recognized Congress to be the representative of the people of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I entirely agree with the Senator from Nevada that President Jefferson never lost sight of his Congress, and never at any time impinged upon the authority of the Congress.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct. Now, will the Senator agree with me that this proposed amendment is a regulatory feature to be written into a delegation of power? The Senator at least agrees that the Congress may delegate the power to fix tariffs. I do not agree with him, but he has taken that position.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Supreme Court of the United States has also taken that position.

Mr. McCARRAN. In other words, we have a right to regulate the delegation, and the action taken pursuant to such delegation.

I have just one more question which I should like to propound to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I shall be glad to answer any question of my distinguished friend from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. With reference to the subject of treaty-making power, I understood the Senator from Missiuri to say that the President of the United States can make a treaty. I cannot go along with my good friend from Missouri in that statement. The President of the United States does not make a treaty. A treaty is formulated by the President, but before it becomes effective it must be submitted to the Senate of the United States and be ratified by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I have never asserted the doctrine that the President of the United States could himself make a treaty. I should be the last to adhere to any such doctrine as that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McFARLAND in the chair). The time of the Senator from Missouri on the amendment has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will take time on the joint resolution.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has criticized those who voted for the amendments, but I believe he has misstated the position in which one opposed to the pending joint resolution is placed. I voted for the first amendment. My objection to the joint resolution is that it would give wholly discretionary power to the President, which I think should not be delegated to the President, for a period of 5 years before it can be changed.

I voted for the first amendment, which I thought was a very mild one. I said that I did not care if the President had that discretion during the war, but that it must be limited after the war. The majority of the Senate refused to agree to the amendment. We were then in the position of completely delegating authority to the President under the Reciprocal Trade Treaties Act, or voting for an amendment which in some way would restrict his power. It might not restrict it in the way I wish to see it restricted, but any of the amendments would remove the basic objection which I have to the joint resolution without any amendment, namely, the unlimited discretion given the President.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator adheres to that view, he could undoubtedly accomplish the same result by an amendment to strike out the enacting clause of the joint resolution.

Mr. TAFT. I intend to vote against the joint resolution unless an amendment shall be agreed to which would accomplish the result which I have indicated.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I appreciate the frankness of the Senator in that statement.

Mr. TAFT. I would rather have the joint resolution with the restriction provided in either the Maloney amendment or the O'Mahoney amendment, than to vote against it altogether. I am in favor of either amendment, but in some way there must be a restriction placed upon the unlimited discretion of the President.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me the Senator would be glad to vote for the joint resolution with the enacting clause stricken out.

Mr. TAFT. As I have said, if no amendment is adopted I shall vote against the joint resolution, but if the first amendment had been adopted, restricting the President's power only as it relates to post-war settlements, I would have voted against the other amendment. It is not a question of asserting that this is a treaty, or an act or anything else. It is a practical question of being presented with a choice of giving unlimited discretion, or adopting an amendment which will more or less limit the President's discretion. Personally, if I had the writing of an amendment, I would not write either the Maloney amendment or the O'Mahoney amendment, and I would not support either of them, but the joint resolution with either of those amendments in it would, in my opinion, remove the basic objection which I have to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course, any of those amendments would be exactly equivalent to selling an automobile with the engine removed.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the first proposal to which I referred would not have such effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am glad to yield further to the Senator from Ohio, but I am under a time limit, and the Senator can take the floor in his own right.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] was very frank today. He said he had voted against the act in 1934 and had voted against an extension joint resolution in 1937, and against another one again in 1940, and that he was not in favor of the pending joint resolution. That was an extremely frank statement, and it simply meant that the Senator from Connecticut was franker than some of those who have offered amendments intended to cut the heart out of this whole proposition and at the same time to be able to say that they did not vote against the continuance of the reciprocal trade agreements.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what the amendment of my distinguished friend from Nevada proposes. It proposes, on page 1, line 8, after the numerals "1943", to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That no commodity or article shall be included in any foreign trade agreement entered into which permits the entry into American markets of products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid—

I am sorry the Senator from Nevada has left the floor, because I should like to have him explain exactly what that means—which total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive products of American workers, miners, or farmers where such American products are commercially available.

I undertake to say, Mr. President, that there is no American citizen, no British citizen, no citizen of any of our allies, no man on earth who would be able, under the McCarran amendment, to tell whether the negotiators had any authority to make an agreement or not. Without any standard, it sets up so many different bases, and, certainly, there is so much confusion in the amendment itself that no intelligent administrator could possibly be able to tell what his authority was. This is simply another of those amendments designed not to accomplish any essential end, but to cut the heart out of the whole principle of international cooperation in trade matters.

When I look at the record of the Senate, Mr. President, as to those who voted first for the Danaher amendment, then for the O'Mahoney amendment, then for the Maloney amendment, and who now intend to vote for the McCarran amendment, I am reminded of an incident that happened when I was a small boy hanging around the House of Representatives. One of the leading Members of the House at that time and one of the ablest debaters of that body, Jerry Simpson of Kansas—unfortunately and unjustly known to some as "Sockless Jerry"—happened to be berating the McKinley administration on one occasion. He was doing it in very unmeasured terms and was called to order. The Speaker directed that his words be taken down, and he was ordered to take his seat under the Rules of the House. The Speaker decided that he had been transgressing the Rules of the House in his references to the Executive, and on appeal on a yea-and-nay vote the decision of the Speaker was sustained. Whereupon the Democratic leader, who, as I recall, was James D. Richardson, of Tennessee, rose and made the customary motion that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order. The House happened to be in a bad humor on that occasion and, on a yea-and-nay vote Jerry Simpson, one of the leading Members of the House, was actually denied the right to proceed in order. So at the conclusion of the roll call Mr. Simpson rose, addressed the Chair, and said, "Mr. Speaker, the House has decided by yea-and-nay vote that I cannot speak out of order; you had decided that first; now the House has decided by yea-and-nay vote that I cannot proceed in order." He said, "Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry is this: 'Where am I at?'" [Laughter.] As quick as a flash, the great Speaker of the House of Representatives, Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, who had as keen a wit as anybody I have ever known serving in the Congress, shook his head and said, "That is one thing that no mortal man has been able to find out."

So I say that those who voted for the Danaher amendment, those who voted for the O'Mahoney amendment, those who voted for the Maloney amendment, and those who are about to vote for the McCarran amendment will never be able to find out exactly "where they are at," because all the amendments embrace contradictory theories.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I understood that while I was conversing with the acting majority leader, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], and my attention was therefore diverted from the course of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, he said that I had left the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was mistaken. At the time the Senator from Nevada did not happen to be in his usual place. I saw him a moment after I made that remark, and I am glad to correct the RECORD and say that the Senator from Nevada has always been on the floor since I have taken the floor.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wonder if the Senator now has any question to propound.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I made some reference to the Senator from Nevada, and I merely mentioned the fact that he did not happen to be on the floor. I have no questions whatever, but I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Nevada for any question he may desire to ask me.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that those who voted for any of the other amendments, the Maloney amendment, the O'Mahoney amendment, and other amendments, and who intend to vote for the amendment now before the Senate, are voting in the spirit of returning the power of the people to the place where the people intended that power to repose?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I by no means agree with the statement of the Senator from Nevada. I do agree that those who voted first for the Danaher amendment and then for the O'Mahoney amendment and for the Maloney amendment, and who intend to vote for the McCarran amendment, are all united by one common purpose of trying to defeat the ultimate aim of international cooperation in trade affairs as represented by reciprocal trade agreements.

I do not agree, Mr. President, that there has been any essential loss of power by the legislative branch in connection with trade agreements. I say that we are doing the same thing that Congress did when it constituted the Interstate Commerce Commission. I say that we are going not nearly so far as Congress went in enacting the flexible provisions of several different tariff acts. I say that the only question here is as to whether we shall absolutely destroy all possible chance for reciprocal trade agreements to succeed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield again to my friend.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that the difference between the power that was delegated by the Congress to the Interstate Commerce Commisison and the power under the reciprocal trade agreements act is that the Interstate Commerce Commisison, if I may use a phrase perhaps out of turn, is an intranational organization; an organization that exercises its powers with respect to domestic questions affecting the Nation; whereas this is a delegation of power affecting international affairs to perform functons which under the form of our Government belong to the representatives of the people.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will say to my friend from Nevada, that if I believed as he believes, I would think that the rejection of the Maloney amendment, which treated this whole matter as a treaty, absolutely answered his question. I should not think, if I held the views just expressed by the Senator from Nevada, that the adoption of his amendment would cure a constitutional situation. I should think that matter was determined by the rejection of the Maloney amendment.

Mr. President, this is either a matter of negotiation of trade agreements in which the Congress recognizes that the negotiation of such agreements—and in order to be successful they must be a subject of negotiation—is a matter too cumbersome for the Congress and for which the Congress has no constitutional process, or else the agreements must be regarded as treaties.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BREWSTER. If it is impossible for a parliamentary body such as ours to participate in any way in the negotiation or the adoption of trade agreements, why is it possible for the parliamentary systems of most of the other great nations to do exactly that?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Because they have no such constitution as the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BREWSTER. How does the Constitution of the United States handicap the functions of this body?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether he knows of any way by which the Congress of the United States can negotiate with foreign nations.

Mr. BREWSTER. I know that the Constitution prohibits it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then, why does the Senator ask the question he has propounded? If we were to assume that the Congress of the United States was desirous of making a 5-percent, or a 10-percent, or a 20-percent horizontal reduction, or any other reduction in the Smoot-Hawley rates—that is the simplest question to put—does the Senator know any way by which Congress could propose such a reduction to other nations?

Mr. BREWSTER. I do not think it would be necessary for us to propose it; we could simply adopt it. In view of the terrific criticism of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, it is very interesting to note the extraordinarily few changes which the Senator's administration has made in it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator had given attention to those matters, I am sure he would understand that very thoroughly. Of course, Congress could not by legislative enactment correct the vicious, bad situation in trade throughout the world which had been created by the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley law, because we had forced other nations not only to put up prohibitive tariff rates in retaliation, but to establish quotas, and to establish exchange regulations, which acted tremendously against the United States, and we could not correct that by an act of Congress.

Mr. BREWSTER. We were not told that in 1932 and 1936, when the Senator's party said that reciprocal trade agreements would afford a cure for this whole matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly told everyone who would listen to me in the State of Missouri in 1932 what the situation was.

Mr. BREWSTER. Did the Senator say it was impossible to remedy it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I certainly did.

Mr. BREWSTER. Did he say it was going to be hopeless to vote for the Democratic Party because they could not possibly cure it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that I hoped the Democratic administration would be able to work out some new machinery.

Mr. BREWSTER. And it has had 10 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think we have accomplished a great deal in that regard.

Mr. BREWSTER. I thought the Senator then said it was impossible to remedy the condition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The reason for the adoption of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act in the first place was that we had made it impossible, by our own stupid and vicious legislation, the Fordney-McCumber Act and the Smoot-Hawley Act, to correct the situation by ourselves, so that it was necessary to provide some new machinery, which we did.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to adhere to my first question, that is, Why it is impossible for the Congress of the United States to adopt agreements which have been negotiated by an agency of this Government, although it is possible for every other parliamentary system in the world to do it; and they actually do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That has been debated at length in this body, and the Senator from Maine is entirely familiar with the arguments. Other nations have different systems. In some nations the responsible heads of the Government are members of the parliament, and they speak, not as representatives of the king, but as the representatives of the parliamentary majority; and that is not true in this country.

Mr. BREWSTER. But they must still account to their parliamentary body for their acts, exactly as I ask that our Executive account to this body for his acts. The analogy is complete.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The analogy is not complete. The Senator from Maine is a Member of this body, and he is perfectly familiar with the fact that under the rules of the Senate any 15 aggressive Senators can defeat any proposal in this body, if they so desire.

Mr. BREWSTER. If the Senator desires to proceed on that theory, then we might as well abolish this body as a functioning part of our Government.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. BREWSTER. Then why, in the most important matter affecting the economy of our country, does the Senator desire that this body be impotent?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not desire that this body be impotent. I think this body yesterday and today, in taking a position by a very substantial majority already on three votes—and I am satisfied we will get the same number on the next vote—is exercising its legislative authority.

The Senator from Maine may not like the three votes which were taken yesterday and today, but under the Constitution he certainly has no complaint about it. Of course, the Senator from Maine is riding several horses going in several different directions at the same time. The Senator from Maine voted for the Danaher amendment, he voted for the O'Mahoney amendment on one theory, and he voted for the Maloney amendment on an absolutely conflicting theory. They cannot possibly be reconciled. Now he is going to vote for the McCarran amendment, I apprehend, which is absolutely in opposition to the theory of both the other amendments.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator is in error. My mind is not yet clear on the McCarran amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator is going to see the light, I should like to withdraw any attempt to commit him to that proposition, because I should like to have him with us, of course. We all have great respect for the ability and logic of the Senator from Maine, and if the Senator is going to see the light, and wants to come over, and is not convinced by the logic of the Senator from Nevada, we should be very glad to have him with us.

Mr. BREWSTER. What is the saying, "While the lamp holds out to burn"——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. "The vilest sinner may return." [Laughter.]

Mr. BREWSTER. I was very much interested in the suggestion of inconsistency in our position, which troubled me a little coming from so logical and distinguished a Member of this body as the Senator from Missouri, and I was happy to hear him subsequently say to the Senator from Nevada that he did recognize the unifying element in our attitude in this amendment we were seeking to adopt.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That you were trying to emasculate the joint resolution.

Mr. BREWSTER. That we were seeking in some measure to circumscribe the unlimited power of the Executive. I have on other occasions heard the Senator from Missouri pursue that subject very eloquently, when he was not in agreement with the course of the Chief Executive, and some Members of this body feel that possibly some limitations of some character, the constitutionality of which I do not think the Senator would question, may be desirable, and I anticipate that within 2 years, when our economy collapses, and the American people are looking for a scapegoat——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. BREWSTER. They may desire to have the Senator then account for his position.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me say to the Senator from Maine that I am perfectly willing to put my record, as one jealous of congressional responsibility, during my 10 years in the Senate of the United States, against that of anyone else who has been a Member of this body during that time. I have never regarded reciprocal trade agreements as being a matter which involved any delegation of power which the Congress should not make, because the history of international cooperation in the form of trade agreements has been such that anyone who has studied the subject to any extent whatever knows that the ratification by the Senate, or congressional enactment, after such an agreement was made, would open up the way to the logrolling practices of general tariff legislation, which not a single Member of the Senate, so far as I know, would be able to stand up and urge now.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the Senator agree that in the parliamentary body of everyone of the larger countries exactly that situation prevails?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I would not agree to that at all.

Mr. BREWSTER. Why is it that the parliamentary bodies of Great Britain, of Canada, and of Brazil are not fully as subject to the unfortunate logrolling proclivities of which the Senator speaks, when they have to adopt a measure which has been negotiated?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator from Maine must certainly be familiar with the fact that certain nations are under a parliamentary system.

Mr. BREWSTER. We are supposed to be.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We are not; the Senator from Maine must certainly know that we have not what is technically known as a parliamentary system.

Mr. BREWSTER. What are we? I thought until recently, that we had a parliamentary system, and that Congress had certain responsibilities.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator from Maine does not know the difference between a parliamentary system in which the leader of the majority, supported by a parliamentary majority, is the executive, and a government in which there is a distinct constitutional executive dissociated from the legislative body, then I shall not take the time of the Senate to undertake to explain it to him now. I should be glad if the Senator would read any standard work on the subject.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I appreciate the dissertation upon government, but it seems to me perfectly evident that when the members of any parliament in the world in considering a trade agreement which has been negotiated with our country, must act formally on its adoption, they must act in exactly the same way that we do. If it happens that they have more confidence in their executive than we have in ours, it is simply a happy and a fortuitous circumstance. But I should assume that, so far as the individual members of the other parliamentary bodies are concerned—and I use the word "parliamentary" in the commonly accepted sense of functioning as we are as the duly elected representatives of the people—exactly the same difficulties which the Senator from Missouri raises against the possibility of our functioning, that we would have logrolling, local considerations, and sectional factors entering into the question, would prevail in Canada, in Great Britain, in Brazil, in all the other countries which have found it perfectly feasible, throughout the 10 years this system has been functioning, to make it operate successfully.

Mr. President, I do not care to labor the point, but I desire that the RECORD should make it clear that there are those in this body who feel that some limitations upon the Executive may be in this instance desirable.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. It seems to me the Senator's argument has even more force with respect to a country which has technically a parliamentary system than with respect to a country such as our own which has technically a constitutional system, because in a technically parliamentary country, the prime minister, or what would correspond to him, is the executive, but he is always subject to removal by the body itself.

Mr. BREWSTER. On a day's notice.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. On a day's notice, on any vote. Whereas in our country under our constitutional system we elect the President for 4 years, and barring very remote conditions, he cannot be removed. So when the Senator from Maine makes the argument that in every country in the world, with the exception of three or four—I believe Cuba, Ecuador, and some others——

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. The parliamentary bodies of those countries have to ratify, either before or after the making of the trade agreements, it occurs to me that his argument applies with more force to such a parliamentary body, which can get rid of its prime minister or chief executive on a moment's notice, whereas we in this country cannot under our system do so.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Idaho. I do not think I could state the situation more beautifully, and I leave it to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to answer the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PEPPER (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], who, if present, would vote "yea." I transfer my pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], who, if present, would vote "nay." I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REVERCOMB. (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. If he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who, if present, would vote "nay." I find I can transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY]. I do so, and vote "yea."

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on important public business. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE]. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Montana would vote "yea," and the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] has a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

CURRENT PAYMENT OF INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2570) to provide for the current payment of the individual income tax, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The report was read.

(See page 5192 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Friday, May 28, 1943, for conference report.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, I take it we are to have an explanation of the conference report.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. I will offer some explanatory statements.

Mr. President, I shall discuss very briefly the results of the work of the conference committee on the tax bill, and will ask to have inserted at appropriate places certain examples and tables which I think may be helpful to Senators in answering inquiries with respect to the tax bill, and in advising themselves about the details of the conference report.

The main question of difference between the conferees was the treatment of the 1942 liability. We were unable to persuade the House conferees to agree to the Senate bill. Neither could the House conferees persuade us to agree to the House bill. Finally we were able to work out the following compromise, which was agreed to by all the Senate conferees and a majority of the House conferees:

First. If the tax for the lower year 1942 or 1943 was $50 or less, 100 percent of the tax liability for the lower year is abated.

Second. If the tax for the lower year 1942 or 1943 was between $50 and $66.67, a flat $50 of the tax for the lower year is abated.

Third. If the tax for the lower year 1942 or 1943 was over $66.67, 75 percent of the tax for the lower year is abated.

The following example will show how the plan is applied:

Tax for 1942	$100
Tax for 1943	50

The taxpayer will be compelled to pay an amount equal to his tax for 1942, which is $100. An amount equal to $50, which is his 1943 tax, will be canceled.

Another example is as follows:

Tax for 1942	$60
Tax for 1943	100

The taxpayer will have $50 canceled, and will have to pay in addition to his 1943 liability an additional amount of $10, making a total payment for 1943 of $110.

Another example is as follows:

Tax for 1942	$100
Tax for 1943	300

In this case, an amount equal to 75 percent of $100 will be canceled, requiring the taxpayer to pay an additional $25 in addition to his 1943 liability of $300, making a total payment for 1943 of $325.

At least one-half of the part of this tax which is not forgiven is payable on March 15, 1944. At the request of the taxpayer, the Commissioner is required to extend the time for the payment of the other half to March 15, 1945. No interest is chargeable during the period of such extension.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a burden table showing, for various net incomes from $1,200 to $5,000,000, the tax liability under existing law, the amounts forgiven and not forgiven under the conference agreement, and the total current burden in 1944 and 1945, assuming that the income remains unchanged.

In connection with the table, I also ask to have inserted an explanatory statement.

There being no objection, the table and explanatory statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Tax liability under existing law, amounts forgiven, not forgiven, and total current burden in 1944 and 1945, under bill agreed to by conferees on May 27, 1943; for a married civilian with no dependents [1]

[4] Assumes income level remains unchanged.

Staff of Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, May 28, 1943.

Explanation of table: It may be noted in this table that in the case of a constant net income of $1,500, the entire 1942 liability of $48 would be forgiven, since it is less than $50, and the 1944 and 1945 burden would amount to $100.13, an amount equivalent to the 1943 tax, including gross Victory. At a net income of $1,510.87, a taxpayer who was married and had no dependents would have a 1942 liability of exactly $50. This entire $50 would be forgiven and his 1944 and 1945 burden would be equal to his 1943 tax of $102.74. The table shows that a person with a net income of $1,600 would be benefited by the so-called notch provision, which adds to the 1943 tax 25 percent of the lower year tax liability, or the excess of such tax liability over $50, whichever is lesser. This individual would have a 1942 calendar year tax liability of $66.40; without the notch provision he would be required to add 25 percent of this amount, or $16.60 to his 1943 tax. However, the notch provision in effect reduces this additional tax by 20 cents to $16.40, the excess over $50. This notch provision ceases to benefit a married person with no dependents when the net income rises above $1,601.47, where the tax is $66.67.

At a net income of $10,000, $1,614 would be forgiven and the total current burden in 1944 and 1945 would amount to $2,945.36, compared with a 1943 tax liability under present law of $2,676.36.

Mr. GEORGE. The conferees retained the second antiwindfall provision of the Senate bill, but made three important changes, which will alleviate some of the harsh effects of the provision. These are as follows:

First. Under the Senate bill the taxpayer could select either the year 1938, 1939, or 1940 as his base or normal year. The conferees agreed to allow him to select also the year 1937.

Second. Under the Senate bill the tentative tax which could be abated was computed on an amount equal to the surtax net income for the normal year, plus $10,000. The conferees raised the $10,000 figure to $20,000.

Third. The conferees provided a special relief provision for partnerships which were operated as corporations during the base year. In such cases the partner could use as his surtax net income for the base year the earnings of the corporation for the base year to which he would have been entitled had the corporation distributed such earnings as dividends.

The whole purpose of this antiwindfall provision was to limit the amount of tax to be abated to the equivalent of the tax computed on an amount equal to the tax on a normal-year income increased by $20,000. An example will show how the second windfall provision will apply in the following case:

	Surtax net income	Tax
1942	$100,000	$64,000
1943	250,000	194,000
Base year	30,000
Base year plus $20,000	50,000	26,240

Since 1942 is less than 1943, the second windfall provision will apply to the year 1942. Under the general rule, we would abate 75 percent of the tax for 1942, or $48,000. However, under the second windfall provision, the amount to be abated cannot exceed a tentative tax on an amount equivalent to the income of the base year plus $20,000, computed at 1942 rates. The tentative tax in such a case will be $26,240. Therefore, the effect of this provision is to abate $26,240 instead of $48,000, leaving uncanceled $37,760 of his 1942 liability.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, would the Senator care to yield at this point, or does he wish to finish his explanation?

Mr. GEORGE. I think I had better finish the explanation, and then I shall be glad to return to any point.

Certain technical or administrative changes were made by the conferees. The most important of these are as follows:

First. In the case of a payment of wages by an employer to an employee through an agent, fiduciary, or other person who has also the control, receipt, custody, or disposal of, or pays the wages payable by another employer to such employee, the Commissioner is authorized to require withholding of the tax by such agent.

Second. In order to avoid administrative difficulties and in order to lessen the burden upon the taxpayer, the withholding provisions will not be applicable to wages paid during 1943 with respect to a pay-roll period beginning before July 1, 1943.

Third. The conference agreement extended the system of current payment of tax not withheld at the source to those nonresident aliens with respect to whose wages withholding at the source is made applicable. Thus, generally speaking, the current tax-payment system will apply to certain nonresident alien individuals, who are residents of a contiguous country and who enter and leave the United States at frequent intervals. Such aliens, with respect to wages received for services performed in this country, are subject to tax in the same manner and to the same extent as citizens of the United States. Since they will be subject to withholding on such wages, failure to include them within the current tax-payment system would cause a considerable doubling up in the payment of their taxes.

Fourth. A provision was added by the conference agreement to require an individual to file a declaration and pay as a part of his estimated tax the amount of his excess 1942 tax liability over his 1943 tax liability, in the case where such individual would otherwise not be required to file a declaration for the taxable year 1943.

With the exceptions noted, the general withholding-at-the-source provisions of the conference report are identical with the provisions which were included in the Senate version and also included in the House language.

TAX RELIEF FOR SERVICEMEN

In opening this discussion of tax relief for servicemen, it should be stated that a serviceman is subject to income tax only upon his base pay, and any additional compensation paid for foreign or special service. Allowances furnished to a serviceman for quarters, subsistence, dependents, and uniforms are not included in gross income for the purpose of individual income tax.

It will be noted that only his base pay and any additional compensation paid for foreign or special service are required to be returned by him for the purpose of his individual income tax.

Both in the Senate bill and in the conference agreement substantial tax relief is extended to servicemen. This relief may be summed up under the following headings:

1. One thousand five hundred dollars exclusion of service pay—

Such exclusion, of course, is available to both married and unmarried servicemen—

2. Special relief from abating the tax for the lesser of the years 1942 or 1943.

3. Special relief for servicemen dying in the service.

Each of these headings will be discussed separately.

1. $1,500 EXCLUSION OF SERVICE PAY

Under existing law, so much of the base pay as is received while in the armed forces from the United States before the termination of the present war by personnel below the grade of commissioned officer in the military or naval forces of the United States, for active service in such forces during such war as does not exceed $250 in the case of a single person, or $300 in the case of a married person, is excluded from gross income. This amounts, in effect, to an exemption of $1,500 in the case of a married person and to $750 in the case of a single person. Both the Senate bill and the conference agreement extended this relief as follows: So much of the compensation as is received by a member of the military or naval forces of the United States for active service in such forces during the present war as does not exceed $1,500 is excluded from gross income. The conference agreement also extends this provision to citizens or residents of the United States serving in the military or naval forces of any other of the United Nations. Unlike the exclusion of $300 for married and $250 for single persons under existing law, this $1,500 exclusion is allowed to all military personnel, and is not restricted to those below the grade of a commissioned officer. This relief provision is made applicable for taxable year beginning in 1943 and will continue for each subsequent year until the present war is terminated.

The following will show the differences between the exclusion under this bill and the exclusion under existing law:

(a) Married man with no dependents

Present law:
Personal exemption	$1,200
Exclusion from income (to those under grade of commissioned officer)	300
Total relief	1,500
Conference agreement:
Personal exemption	1,200
Exclusion from income (to all military personnel)	1,500
Total	2,700

(b) Married man with 2 dependents

Present law:
Personal exemption	$1,200
Exclusion from income (to those under grade of commissioned officer)	300
Credit for 2 dependents	700
Total relief	2,200
Conference agreement:
Personal exemption	1,200
Exclusion from income (to all military personnel)	1,500
Credit for 2 dependents	700
Total relief	3,400

(c) Single man

Present law:
Personal exemption	$500
Exclusion from income (to those under grade of commissioned officer)	250
Total relief	750
Conference agreement:
Personal exemption	500
Exclusion from income (to all military personnel)	1,500
Total relief	2,000

2. SPECIAL RELIEF FROM ABATING THE TAX FOR THE LESSER OF THE YEARS 1942 OR 1943

The effect of the conference agreement in abating the tax for the lesser of the year 1942 or 1943 in the case of a civilian is as follows:

First. If the tax for the lower of 1942 or 1943 is $50 or less, 100 percent of the tax for the lower year is abated.

Second. If the tax for the lower of 1942 or 1943 is between $50 and $66.67, a flat $50 is abated.

Third. If the tax for the lower of 1942 or 1943 is over $66.67, 75 percent of the tax for the lower year is abated.

It was recognized that this would result in hardship upon a person in the armed services in 1942 or 1943, since the tax for 1943, will, in most cases, be considerably lower than the tax for 1942. In 1943, the income of a great many men in the service is limited to their service pay. Therefore, a special relief provision was adopted to prevent the full tax from being collected for 1942 in the case of such persons.

The effect of the provision is to abate all the 1942 tax which was due to the inclusion of the earned net income in the taxpayer's net income for 1942, if the taxpayer had no 1943 tax to pay. If the taxpayer had a 1943 tax to pay, a part of the 1942 tax would, in effect, be collected by the addition of 25 percent of the tax for 1943, the lesser year, and abating the entire 1942 tax. Earned income is limited to so much of the income from wages, salaries, and other amounts received as compensation for personal services as does not exceed $14,000. If the taxpayer's net income is not more than $3,000, his entire net income is considered earned net income and if his net income is more than $3,000, his earned income is considered to be not less than $3,000. Earned net income is earned income less deductions properly chargeable against earned income.

The following examples will illustrate the effect of this provision:

In the case of civilians, the amount by which the 1942 tax would exceed the 1943 tax is in effect brought over to 1943 and added to the 1943 tax. For example, if a civilian's tax would be $200 in 1942 and $100 in 1943, there would be added to the tax of 1943 of $100, another $100 from 1942, making the 1943 tax $200. In the case of servicemen, the part of 1942 tax which was attributable to earned income would not be brought over and added to the 1943 tax. In the above example, if all of the $200 1942 tax was on account of earned income, none of it would be brought over and added to 1943, so that the 1943 tax would be $100. However, since only 75 percent of the 1942 tax is forgiven there would be added to the 1943 tax an additional 25 percent of the lesser of 1942 or 1943. So that in the example for the civilian there is added to 1943, 25 percent of 1943, which is the lesser year, or $25, making the total 1943 civilian tax $225, while for servicemen there will be added 25 percent of 1943, or $25, to his 1943 tax of $100, making his total 1943 tax $125.

Mr. President, I now set out examples, with explanatory notes showing just how the tax will apply to servicemen:

EXAMPLE I. ALL EARNED INCOME IN 1942 AND NO TAX PAYABLE FOR 1943

Assume a married man with a net income of $10,000, derived entirely from salary, who was liable for 1942 tax of $2,152, and that he entered the service in 1943. Assume he owes no tax for the year 1943. The effect of this relief provision is to cancel his entire 1942 tax of $2,152.

EXAMPLE II. ALL EARNED INCOME IN 1942 AND TAX PAYABLE FOR 1943

Assume the same situation as to 1942 and a tax of $600 for 1943. All of the 1942 tax of $2,152 will be canceled. To the 1943 tax of $600 will be added 25 percent of the lesser year, which is 1943, or $150, making the total 1943 tax $750. However, this additional 25 percent is payable $75 on March 15, 1944, and $75, March 15, 1945. Moreover, under a provision of existing law the payment of this additional amount, as well as the 1943 tax, can be postponed by the Commissioner until 90 days after the termination of the present war.

EXAMPLE III. PARTLY EARNED AND PARTLY UNEARNED INCOME

Assume that a married man entered the service in 1943 and that his tax situation for 1942 and 1943, under existing law, is as follows:

Year	Net income	Earned net income	Tax
1942	$20,000	$10,000	$6,452
1943	0	0	0

Under the conference agreement, because he was in the armed service the amount of tax for 1942 to be added to his tax for 1943 is $2,152, as shown by the following computation:

(1) Excess of 1942 tax over 1943 tax	$6,452
(2) Increase in 1942 tax due to earned income	4,300
(3) Amount of 1942 tax to be added to 1943 tax	2,152
(4) 1943 tax	2,152

Since the serviceman owes no tax for 1943, the only amount payable as his 1943 tax is the carry-over of $2,152. The amount of $2,152 would, therefore, become the estimated tax for 1943, and when declaring this amount in the return to be filed September 15, 1943, the serviceman would take credit for whatever amount he had paid on his 1942 taxes in March and June 1943. His payments through June 30 would amount to at least $3,226. This taxpayer would, therefore, have no additional payments to make in September and December 1943, and would later receive either a credit or a refund amounting to at least $1,074. It will be seen that this relief provision has reduced this taxpayer's 1942 tax liability from $6,452 to $2,152, a reduction of $4,300.

If this serviceman had a tax for 1943 of $746, his tax for 1943 would be less than the tax for the year 1942. Accordingly, the 1942 tax will be abated and the 1943 tax will be increased by the sum of (1) the 1942 carry-over tax of $1,406, and (2) 25 percent of the 1943 tax, or $186.50. His total 1943 tax will, therefore, amount to $2,338.50 as shown by the following computation:

(2) 1943 tax	746.00
(3) Excess of 1942 tax over 1943 tax	5,706.00
(4) Increase in 1942 tax due to earned income	4,300.00
(5) Amount of 1942 tax to be added to 1943 tax (3) minus (4)	1,406.00
(6) 25 percent of 1943 tax	186.50
(7) Total 1943 tax (2) plus (5) plus (6)	2,338.50

Mr. President, a table, which I asked to have inserted in the RECORD at this point illustrates, for specific cases, the special tax relief accorded members of the armed forces as the result of the exclusion of $1,500 from gross income, and the relief from the antiwindfall provision which requires payment of tax on the higher year, 1942 or 1943. I also ask that the explanatory statement attached to the table be printed.

There being no objection the table and explanatory statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOTE.—In computing tax liability deductions are assumed to be 10 percent of gross income.

Staff of Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, May 31, 1943.

Explanation of table: The tax liability under existing law, the amount forgiven, the amount not forgiven, and the total current burden is shown in this table for civilians, for soldiers who entered the armed forces on January 1, 1943, and therefore, would receive the benefit of the $1,500 exclusion with respect to 1943 income, and for soldiers who entered the armed forces on December 31, 1943, and therefore would not receive the benefit of the $1,500 exclusion with respect to 1943 income. It is assumed the person is married and has no dependents.

It will be noted that where the gross income is $50 a month in 1943, or $600 for the year, resulting in no 1943 tax liability for either civilian or soldier, and the 1942 income was high enough to result in some tax liability, the civilian in effect is forgiven nothing, and must pay his 1942 tax in full in 1943, while the soldier is forgiven his entire 1942 tax and is required to pay nothing in 1943, or in subsequent years so long as he is in active service in the war and his income remains unchanged.

In the case of gross incomes of $5,000 in 1942 and $3,200 in 1943, a civilian would be forgiven $323.04, would be required to pay $639 in 1943, and $692.84 in 1944 and 1945, if his income remained unchanged. A soldier who entered the armed forces January 1, 1943, and who had the same gross incomes as the civilian would be forgiven $612.17, would be required to pay only $107.32 in 1943 and $120.74 in 1944 and 1945. A soldier who entered the armed services on December 31, 1943, and who had the same gross incomes would be forgiven $531.32, would be required to pay $430.72 in 1943 and $161.16 in 1944 and 1945.

In the case of gross incomes of $10,000 in 1942, and $3,200 in 1943, the soldier who entered the armed forces on January 1, 1943, would be forgiven $1,476.13 more than the civilian, and the soldier who entered the armed forces on December 31, 1943, would be forgiven $1,395.28 more than the civilian.

3. SPECIAL RELIEF FOR SERVICEMEN DYING IN THE SERVICE

Mr. GEORGE. Finally, Mr. President, under the conference bill certain special relief for servicemen dying in the service is provided and the provisions of the conference bill should be here noted.

Under the conference agreement, any individual who dies on or after December 7, 1941, while in the active service as a member of the military or naval forces of the United States, or of the United Nations, and prior to the termination of the present war, is relieved of any income tax (including interest, additions to the tax, and additional amounts) which were unpaid at the date of his death. If such unpaid amounts are collected after the date of his death, they will be refunded. This provision is designed to protect the widow and other survivors of a deceased serviceman from being forced to deplete the estate of the deceased serviceman by income taxes which he owed at the time of his death. It was thought that since the serviceman had given his life for his country, his widow or other survivors should not be subjected to the payment of income tax which the serviceman owed at the time of his death. This provision is less complicated than the Senate provision under which the relief was limited to earned income of not more than $14,000 and to taxes which in general were due after the person entered the service. We were forced to yield in favor of the House provision, but the conference extended this relief to a person dying in the active armed service of any other of the United Nations.

REVENUE EFFECTS

Mr. President, the immediate effect of the conference bill will be to increase the Federal individual income-tax revenue in the fiscal year 1944 by about $3,014,000,000, or to $16,014,000,000. It makes the transition tc a system of current payment by discharging approximately $6,511,000,000, which is equivalent to about 66 percent of the 1942 income-tax liability of individuals. It reduces taxes about $759,000,000 through the special treatment accorded the armed forces. The net effect, therefore, is to carry over to be collected in 1943 and subsequent years about $2,545,000,000, as compared with the 1942 liability of $9,815,000,000. The bill agreed to in conference will bring in during the fiscal year 1944 about $2,991,000,000 more revenue than the House bill and about $1,102,000,000 more than the Senate bill. In addition, the new system of collection will increase the revenues by reaching more completely the income subject to tax not reached under the existing method of collection. There are many other benefits, both to the Government and the taxpayers, which cannot be evaluated in terms of dollars and cents. The effect on the revenues is shown by the table which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparative amounts of tax liability canceled, not canceled, and due in the fiscal year 1944, under the conference agreement, the Senate bill, the House bill, and present law

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, that is all I have to say with reference to the conference report, and when the examples and tables inserted in the RECORD are examined, I think most practical questions arising can be very readily answered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator has made a very excellent analysis of the bill, and I think most of us who have been following the legislation have a pretty clear understanding of what the conference report proposes to do. I have one question, however, on which I am not entirely clear. Under the second windfall provision a recovery is to be made of taxes paid by persons receiving very large incomes due to the war, but in the provision was any leeway given, or any relief afforded, to persons who happened to have very large incomes in 1942 not due to the war or to war profits?

I am inquiring because I have just received two telegrams, and one of them, from a trust officer of one of the large Denver banks, presents this question:

DENVER, COLO., June 2, 1943.
Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Have been attempting to apply proposed Current Tax Payment Act of 1943 to specific case of the beneficiary of a large trust created by will in 1942. The beneficiary will receive an estimated one-hundred-and-sixty-odd-thousand dollars of fully taxable income during 1943, and it appears that her total Federal taxes payable from that income, including normal tax, surtax, unforgiven portion of 1942 tax, windfall tax, and Victory tax, will aggregate slightly more than her total income from the trust during 1943. The inequity seems to lie in the large windfall tax inasmuch as the trust beneficiary had only nominal income during the base years. The income involved is not in any way connected with war profits, and the beneficiary is without sufficient capital funds with which to pay deficiency and pay expenses until income for future years is received.

Was any provision made for such a condition?

Mr. GEORGE. If the income was received in 1943, I assume the tax for that year was higher than the tax for 1942. In that case the second windfall tax will only apply to the year 1942, and only to that year if in excess of the income for the normal year plus $20,000. So far as the second windfall is concerned the conference agreement permits the taxpayer to take the highest income he received in 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940, and increase that income by $20,000. Then the unabated 1942 tax which results under the second windfall is payable in four annual installments, beginning in March 1945. It is payable in four installments—that is, on March 15, 1945, March 15, 1946, March 15, 1947, and March 15, 1948. I do not, therefore, believe that this windfall provision is as harsh on the taxpayer described in the telegram as might appear at first blush.

Under the pay-as-you-go system, the taxpayer will estimate his 1943 tax and pay the estimated tax in 1943. Therefore, any part of his 1942 tax which he is required to carry over into subsequent years will not be required to be paid until after 1943.

It was recognized that in most cases the $20,000 income, plus the highest earnings of the taxpayer in either one of his 4 base years, would fairly well protect him against the windfall provision where his income had not gone up on account of war conditions or war profits. It was not the desire of the conferees fully to abate the tax liability of those who had profited as a result of war contracts. I know that is not the case mentioned in the telegram, and that case may be one of hardship, but ordinary taxpayers who find themselves in such a position, by and large nearly all of them, with a few exceptions, will be fairly well protected by taking the highest earnings in any one of the 4 base period years and adding $20,000, calculating the liability on that total income, and comparing it with the tax for 1942 or 1943, whichever is the lesser year.

I think, however, I may say that, in my judgment, the greatest benefit we have given in hardship cases such as that the Senator has presented results from the spread of the windfall recoupment over 4 years.

I may say now to the Senator and to the Senate that, in my judgment, in the case of individuals who have not profited from the war there may be undue hardship for which we will have to provide some form of relief. We were faced with a similar situation under the excess-profits tax as applied to corporations, and after the enactment of the law it had to be amended to provide for hardship cases. I think it very safe to say that in genuine hardship cases, such as that referred to, the Congress would have ample opportunity to work out relief provisions. But there is no special relief provision in the conference report to fit a case such as that presented by the Senator from Colorado if real hardship results.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to ask a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I desire to say a word further, and then I shall be glad to take my seat.

I am very grateful to the Senator from Georgia for his explanation of the relief provisions which are offered by the conference report and for the hope he has so well expressed that relief may be given in the future in such a hardship case as I have just described.

In the telegram it was suggested that an amendment be offered to the conference report, which, of course, is not parliamentarily possible. We have to accept the report as it is or reject it as it is, and there is no chance to make any corrections in the provisions of the conference report at this time. So the hope for relief in the future that is expressed by the able Senator from Georgia is very much appreciated.

Mr. GEORGE. I am reasonably sure that Congress itself would desire to take care of proper cases. That is the only consolation I can offer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Georgia has said, but I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether it is not true that the provisions as to the second windfall, as contained in the conference report, are very much more liberal as to individual taxpayers than the provisions of the bill as reported from the Senate Finance Committee to the Senate——

Mr. GEORGE. And as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And specifically those written by the Senator from Colorado himself. The Senator from Georgia will recall that the original provision was defeated by a tie vote, and then the Senator from Colorado had the opportunity to put in a couple of amendments, which he did, which marshaled enough votes to put over the second windfall tax in the Senate Finance Committee. Does the Senator from Georgia have the slightest doubt that the provisions of the conference report are very much more liberal as to individual taxpayers than the provisions of the bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee to the Senate, which were written essentially by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] himself?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to say, Mr. President, that the second windfall provision in the conference report is more liberal to the individual income taxpayer who is affected by it than the bill which was approved by the Senate Finance Committee and passed by the Senate. Under the windfall provision of the Senate bill approximately $400,000,000 would have been recouped from individual income taxpayers, whereas under the conference report $200,000,000 will be recouped. But I think I should say in justice to the Senator from Colorado, and I am sure the Senator from Missouri will approve what I am about to say, that the proposals made by the Senator from Colorado in the Senate Finance Committee greatly helped the windfall provisions in the bill, as we had it under consideration at the time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield I will say that I am very happy to agree to that statement. I think the Senator from Colorado contributed greatly to agreement in the Finance Committee; as a matter of fact I know he did, because the Finance Committee reversed itself——

Mr. GEORGE. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On the basis of two of his suggestions. This is a very late day for the Senator from Colorado to be coming forward and objecting to the second windfall provision, because it was really much more greatly modified than the provision which he himself originally presented.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not understand the Senator from Colorado to be objecting. He was simply bringing to our attention a proposition which was not presented before we had concluded the conference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I think it is only fair to say, and I hope the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will agree with my statement, that I was not the author of the second windfall provision, to the contrary I was bitterly opposed to it, but when I could not defeat it I did offer two amendments which greatly modified it, and afforded some relief under it. I was not entirely satisfied with the relief afforded by my amendments; I should have liked to go much further, but in legislation we have to do the very best we can. The senior Senator from Colorado did the best he could to eliminate the second windfall provision. Had I thought at the time of the special hardship situation which is disclosed by the telegram which I have just read certainly I would have offered some amendments dealing with that particular point. But what we were trying to do in the committee was to correct excessive war profits which might escape under the abatement of 1 year's taxes. The Senator from Missouri will recall that I voted against the Carlson-Ruml bill for the reason it contained this very second windfall provision.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am very glad to approve all that the Senator from Colorado has said, because he has given a faithful and detailed statement of his activities, as I recall them, in regard to the second windfall provision of the measure.

Mr. President, I believe I have nothing further to submit.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, on the vote on the conference report I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, from the minority side of the conference I wish to make a brief statement regarding the general situation, inasmuch as the minority conferees have joined in the report, having done so chiefly for the sake of unity in the war effort, a unity which the administration always demands, but too frequently neglects to encourage or does not deserve.

The conference was the most difficult in which I have ever participated in all my 15 years in the Senate. Seemingly insurmountable barriers confronted us for many days, and only a dogged determination to serve the public interest by preventing a collapse of the conference kept it alive. The public interest required an agreement. Our ultimate choice—as it is the Senate's—was this agreement or nothing.

In this connection I give my full measure of praise to the distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], and to the genuinely brave statesmanship, in the last analysis, of the distinguished chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]. But I should also like to have the record show—particularly to those voluble critics who automatically charge a political taint against Republican attitude—that an agreement would have been impossible without Republican cooperation.

From start to finish, except upon an inconsequentially few occasions, the seven Senate conferees almost invariably voted as a unit, without regard to partisan lines, seeking only the best national welfare under these difficult circumstances. I hope this may be some evidence of good faith to the country behind the compromise which is now presented.

It is needless to say that the result is far from satisfactory to any of us—least of all to the minority, which has faithfully supported the Carlson-Ruml plan ever since the proposed legislation was initiated. We wanted to make all possible American taxpayers current in their tax liabilities with least possible delay, treating all alike without discrimination. We confronted majority conferees from the House who really wanted no abatement at all. We also confronted an adverse situation which was seriously and almost fatally complicated by the attitude of an obdurate Treasury and by the recent inflammatory letter from the President. Such a situation manifestly was not one of easy composition.

In this situation, fraught with great danger to the war effort, if the Congress should fail to function in this critical, fiscal need, I wish to say to my minority colleagues that their spokesmen in the conference joined with their majority Senate conferees, and with the House minority conferees and one House majority conferee, in making the pending recommendation—believing it to be the best available answer to the current problem.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am very much interested in the very dispassionate statement being made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan. Does not the Senator think it ought to be stated at this point that there was not one single member of the conference, from either the House or the Senate, as between the Houses, or as between the Democratic and Republican Parties, who was in favor of the bill as it passed the House of Representatives, or who was willing to take the responsibility for it?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Missouri is entirely correct. He is historically accurate as to that particular issue.

I wish further to say to my minority colleagues to whom I as one of the conferees am really reporting, that we joined in holding the line for 5 torrid days against a drive which would have entirely emasculated the Senate bill and, in my view, would have cheated the legitimate hopes of a great majority of the American people. The final compromise, now here pending, is a combination of the 75-percent abatement plan originally presented by the able Senator from Georgia, plus refinements proposed by our minority, namely, the total elimination from the remaining 25 percent of pyramiding taxes in 1944 and 1945 for some 4,000,000 taxpayers in the lowest brackets.

The conference report will put probably 90 percent of all taxpayers on a current basis at once, and 100 percent within 2 years. It will make tax collection at the source immediately possible—a device, whether we like it or not, which is indispensable to the war effort. It will substantially increase the Federal tax revenue for 1943, 1944, and 1945. It probably will stabilize individual income taxes for the next 2 years. It will strongly help in the vital battle against inflation. Meanwhile, it will save Congress and the country from the spectacle of democracy's impotence in a crisis.

Mr. President, with great respect for the good conscience of many Members of Congress who oppose this report, nevertheless I observe that it is always pleasant and comfortable to vote against a tax bill—and particularly a war bill such as this. But duty is frequently unpleasant and uncomfortable. This bill will further burden the purse and the patience of our people. It will further load down American employers with tax-collection tasks for their Government, which ought to reciprocate by lightening the load in other directions. But it is all still a relatively small war price which we thus pay on the home front. I respectfully recommend this conference report to my minority colleagues, regardless of its unsatisfactory features. And to the President and the Treasury I respectfully recommend a greater willingness in the future to play team ball with the Congress in meeting our further fiscal emergencies.

In his first public utterance after becoming virtually Assistant President, the estimable Mr. Byrnes said on Monday night that he would do all in his power to bring about the same coordination of efforts among the civilians in governmental agencies that exists on the military fronts. I respectfully suggest to him that there is tremendous opportunity for him to exercise this saving grace when he speaks to the White House and the Treasury regarding their future congressional relationships in respect to further fiscal crises.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I have no desire whatever in the brief time I shall occupy the floor this afternoon to speak for the majority or for the minority in connection with the presentation of the conference report.

I joined with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] in being the first congressional sponsors of the principle of pay-as-you-earn taxation. As a subcommittee, we offered that report to the Finance Committee nearly a year ago; and in the full Finance Committee we obtained for the report only our own votes.

Since that time much water has passed over the dam, much expression of public opinion has been had, much changement of alignment has been made. Unfortunately, as I have said before on this floor, in the House of Representatives the matter had become one of partisan debate and partisan consideration. I think that is one of the most unfortunate things which ever has happened in the tax history of the United States.

In this body, fortunately, Mr. President, there never has been any partisan alinement on the question of pay-as-you-go, pay-as-you-earn, collection at the source. When the matter was considered in the Finance Committee a few weeks ago, as many Democrats voted for the motion which I made to report the so-called Ruml plan, the modified Ruml plan, as Democrats voted against it.

That matter was considered in this body, Mr. President, and was fully considered; and the plan was adopted in the Senate bill by a vote of 49 to 30, as I now recall.

A conference committee was appointed at the instance of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. That committee certainly adequately represented the view of the Senate as to devotion to the Senate bill. The committee represented two Members of the Senate who had voted against the Senate bill, the Senator from Georgia, himself, and the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. It included five other Senators who not only had voted for the Senate bill, but who were devoted in principle to it.

Between the time when the bill was passed by the Senate and the time when the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was voted on in the House, the President of the United States saw fit to express his views on that question and, in effect, to announce his intention to veto that bill. I think the letter of the President undoubtedly was decisive in the vote of the House of Representatives as to concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. President, I am not one of those who have criticized the President or who now want to criticize him for his timely expression of his position on a measure which might be presented to him for signature. I cannot imagine anything which would be less conducive to national unity and to common purpose than for the Congress of the United States solemnly to pass a bill which the President already knew in advance he would be forced to veto.

Therefore, Mr. President, when we started the conference the Senate conferees commenced it with the proposition in mind that it would be necessary for us to compromise; because there was not a single member of the conference committee, either on the part of the House or on the part of the Senate, who would seriously assert that it would be conducive to national unity for the Congress to pass a bill which the President would be forced to veto.

The Senate conferees, on the first day of the conference, in view of the President's letter, very frankly came down to essentially the position which is involved in the final conference report; and I am certain that I speak for the Senator from Massachusetts as well as for myself and for the Senator from Michigan and for the other minority Members when I say that when we stated that proposition we were stating the irreducible minimum to which we would be willing to go.

We had several days of the most tortuous conferences, which wore on all of us, starting early in the morning and lasting until late in the afternoon. There were many times when it was apparent to most of us on the conference committee that there was no possibility of agreement, and the suggestion repeatedly was made that the conference be broken up in disagreement. But always the suggestion was made, Mr. President, that there were two great hazards that we had to avoid. One was adopting a conference report which we knew the President would feel compelled to veto. The other was breaking up the conference and conveying to the people of the United States the impression that the Congress was unable to legislate.

There were honest convictions on both sides of the conference, both with regard to the Senate position and the House position, and with regard to the Republican position and the Democratic position. I say, Mr. President, as my deliberate opinion as one of the first sponsors of the 100-percent cancelation of taxes, the skip-a-year plan, the Ruml plan of taxation, or whatever one may choose to call it, that I believe that the compromise conference report brought in by the Senate and House conferees is the very best proposition that could possibly have been agreed upon in order to bring about legislation, and that that is very much better than would be a complete failure of legislation.

No one questioned at any turn of the road the desirability and necessity of having collection at the source and making the Nation current with its taxes. The only dispute between us at any stage was as to how much additional taxes, in the way of double taxation, the individual taxpayer could possibly stand in order to achieve a result favorable to himself and favorable to the Treasury, making him current with his taxes. The conference report represents the ultimate maximum on the one side and the ultimate minimum on the other side. I believe that the Senate should follow the example of the House and adopt the conference report by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as one of the Senate conferees on the tax bill, I wish to say that I have never known a group of men who labored more diligently and cooperatively to reach a conclusion on one of the most difficult and controversial subjects that has ever been presented to a congressional conference.

I especially wish to pay tribute to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and to Mr. DOUGHTON, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, for their patience and leadership in the final report, which was adopted by the conferees by a vote of 11 to 3.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to add a word to what the Senator has said. I intended to say it, but I was speaking extemporaneously, and did not mention the services of the chairman of the Finance Comittee and the chairman of the House Ways and Means Commiteee. They are certainly entitled to all credit for this agreement.

Mr. BYRD. I wish to say, too, that the Republican members of the conference showed a most cooperative spirit in the effort to reach an agreement.

If the conference had been unable to reach an agreement, I believe that the average citizen of this country would have reached the conclusion that Congress was unable to function and to make a final decision on a question which has created perhaps as much interest on the part of the average citizen as any domestic question that has been presented to the Congress in many years.

It is true, I think, that the agreement reached did not fully meet the views of any single conferee; but I am of the firm conviction that it was much wiser to reach an agreement, even though some concessions had to be made by every conferee in the effort to harmonize the differences that existed.

In view of the mutual advantages of a pay-as-you-earn system of taxation, both to the Government and to the individual taxpayer, it was my opinion the taxpayer and the Government should each make a suitable contribution to attain a tax policy which would be beneficial to both.

I was hopeful that some agreement could be reached with an abatement of between 50 and 60 percent, with collection of the balance in a 2-year period, and provision for a longer period in special hardship cases, but this could not be agreed upon.

What is definitely accomplished by the conference report is, first, the collection of a withholding tax effective July 1 next, of not exceeding 20 percent on wages and salaries, with certain exemptions; and, second, it has accomplished the objective of placing the entire income tax system as affecting individuals on a pay-as-you-go basis on March 15, 1945.

It is essential, in my opinion, that a withholding tax at the source be instituted at the earliest possible time, and that very great advantages will accrue from a complete pay-as-you-go tax system such as is made effective on March 15, 1945, by the conference report.

We may as well face frankly the fact that for years, and perhaps for generations to come, this country must pay exceedingly heavy and burdensome taxes. Before our Budget is balanced, we shall have a colossal debt, which may exceed $300,000,000,000, and is not likely to be less. The servicing and gradual payment of this debt, combined with the essential expenditures of Government, will tax to the utmost the resources of all our citizens. Under these conditions, it is obviously very beneficial to bring tax collections as close as possible to the period during which the money was earned on which income taxes must be paid. Under the present system, the taxpayer begins to earn an income on January 1 of one year, but he does not pay his final tax on such earnings until December 15 of the following year. In other words, he does not pay finally until 23½ months later. To shorten this period undoubtedly will make more flexible the tax collection system with mutual benefits both to the Government and to the taxpayer.

For this reason, Mr. President, and because I thought that it was important to reach an agreement, after advocating as strongly as I could the principles I supported in the Senate debate on the tax measure reported by the Senate Finance Committee, I signed the conference report, and believe it would be for the best interests of the country that the report be adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement of the reasons why I shall vote against the conference report.

I do not in anywise wish anything I may say or may not say to be taken as a criticism of the Senate conferees. Obviously, the report upon which they agreed was well within their power, and I have no doubt that they labored arduously and long in order to arrive at any agreement whatever.

I have already set forth rather fully my reasons for being unalterably opposed to the bill as it passed the Senate on May 14. I shall not now repeat the statement of those reasons; but, in my opinion, the basic arguments against the bill as it passed the Senate lie against the conference report.

As I see it, we cannot escape the fact that more than $6,000,000,000 of taxes are being abated, forgiven, or canceled. We cannot escape the further fact, in my opinion, that the adoption of this report, with the 25-percent carry-over for the next 2 years, will in all probability create such a situation that the additional taxes, which every person recognizes must be levied if we are to avoid uncontrolled inflation, will have to be fried out of the hides of the people of this country who are in the lower income group. To my mind that will be a tragic consequence of the adoption of this report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as has been indicated by previous speakers, the task assigned to the conferees was most troublesome and confusing. We were confronted in the conference room with the atmosphere which had been developed in the House by reason of 3 long months of agitation and discussion of various ways and methods to establish the pay-as-you-go tax system. That atmosphere entered into the conference room, and we were confronted with two elements. The Republican conferees on the part of the House were apparently willing to go before the country in the next election—assuming, of course, a disagreement in the conference—on the issue of the pay-as-you-go tax plan. The Democratic conferees on the part of the House were disposed to preserve the law as it was, maintain the present statutes, and fight out the issue of forgiveness, as well as the extent of forgiveness, in connection with the adoption of a pay-as-you-go tax plan.

Fortunately the Republican members of the conference on the part of the Senate brought into the deliberations a spirit of cooperation, compromise, and an earnest and sincere desire to reach an agreement.

I do not wish to diminish the credit which should be accorded to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] or the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], but perhaps more than any other man the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] led the way toward reaching an agreement. He abandoned all thought of keeping alive a political issue upon this question, and I think it was his unselfish leadership which led his party colleagues on the part of the House to change their attitude and join in an earnest and sincere desire to reach a united conference report.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, the Senator knows—and it will bear out what he has just said—that it was a noteworthy fact that in nearly all the votes which were taken in the conference the House conferees voted 4 to 3 one way or the other, while almost without exception the Senate conferees voted unanimously 7 to 0.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I entirely agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in what he has said relative to the influence of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to emphasize that. If no other record is made of this controversy, I wish to pay special tribute to the spirit of tolerance, and the abandonment of any partisan consideration upon the part of the Senator from Michigan. His attitude was really inspiring.

I shall not take time to indicate how much we all are indebted to the gallant and able chairman of the Finance Committee for his leadership. That has already been referred to. As usual, he was patient, considerate, tolerant, and able in the presentation of his views.

However, there was one other member of the Committee of Conference to whom great credit is due, and that is the noble and able Representative from North Carolina, Mr. DOUGHTON, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. When the crisis came over whether we should disagree and have no report, or bring a report back to Congress, he stood alone among his conferees of his own political faith and decided that it would be unfortunate for the Congress to confess to the country its inability to pass a tax bill at this time. His attitude was most commendable, and was taken under circumstances which impressed every member of the conference. The depth of feeling and sincere racking of his conscience to reach a decision deeply impressed every one of us.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate, but there are some facts which I should like to have made a matter of record in connection with the closing of this discussion, and I shall briefly present some views which I think should be made a matter of record in connection with this controversy.

Mr. President, acceptance by the House and Senate of the conferees' report may be taken for granted, and if the President interposes no veto and the bill becomes law, it will constitute a big forward step in dealing with the immensely complex tax problem which confronts our country, or any country, in time of war. The change over to the pay-as-you-go basis of tax collections will yield larger revenues to the Treasury this year than would otherwise have been the case, and the pay-roll withholding tax, starting July 1, will supply a partial check on the inflationary spiral arising from an increasing supply of money and a diminishing supply of goods. The settlement of the present tax controversy and the enactment of the present bill will clear the path for early consideration by Congress of the bill to raise additional revenues, and to impose additional taxes in various categories to help meet the prodigious needs of the Treasury for funds.

Unfortunately, in dealing with this question of putting the taxpayers of the country on a current basis, there has been a great deal of misrepresentation, appeals to great prejudices, and much sparring for political advantage. It has not been confined to one party, either. The issue has been distorted and the advantages to the Government, as well as to the country, of modernizing our tax system and putting it on a sound, business basis, have been obscured. The method of paying income taxes 1 year after the income was received was not particularly burdensome to the taxpayers, nor prejudicial to the Treasury, so long as the number of income taxpayers was comparatively small, their incomes constant, and the rates relatively moderate. The big increase in the number of income taxpayers arising both by reason of the broadening of the tax base effectuated in the 1943 tax bill, as well as by increased earnings, the higher income-tax rates now imposed, and the wide fluctuations in tax liability from year to year resulting from war conditions, all combined to create the need and Nation-wide demand for revision in the methods of tax assessment and tax collection.

The adoption of the plan to pay taxes at the time and in the year when incomes are earned is of decided benefit to the Treasury.

In my opinion, it is of more benefit to the Treasurer than to anyone else. It means that the Treasury will be able to collect future taxes more easily and in larger volume. It is also a convenience to all taxpayers, large and small. The contention that this change over to a pay-as-you-earn plan is of particular benefit to taxpayers in the high income brackets is not true. It is no hardship on wealthy taxpayers to pay their taxes a year or 2 years after receipt of income on which they are levied. The wealthy, unlike the ordinary wage earner and white collar worker, have accumulated funds out of which to pay their income taxes as well as enjoy the opportunity to borrow on their capital, if that be necessary.

Another misrepresentation indulged in by the opponents of the pay-as-you-earn tax plan is that taxpayers are forgiven all or a part of the taxes of 1 year by the proposed change. This in theory may be urged, but as a reality every taxpayer will pay taxes—increased taxes—this year and every year that he lives in the same way that he has paid taxes in the past. Furthermore, the compromise pay-as-you-go tax plan that the conferees have agreed upon will place in the Public Treasury this year and in every year in which incomes continues to increase, more money than any other plan proposed. This would be true even if the present tax system were continued. There is no current financial loss to the Government by the new plan.

I have favored from the very outset the placing of all taxpayers on a current tax-paying basis without discrimination.

This would compel all taxpayers to pay the taxes levied under the tax law of last year in full, and leave the way open and free to increase future taxes on a graduated scale, which has become the fixed policy on the ability-to-pay theory.

Those who preferred to continue the present obsolete tax system were unwilling to change to the new system without imposing what I call penalties for this privilege. The result was that various proposals were made arranging for a 50-percent carry-over to be added to the 1943 taxes. The imposing of as high a carry-over tax as 50 percent would bankrupt many taxpayers, and would amount, in many instances, to what has never yet been imposed in any tax law, namely, a tax on taxpayers' capital.

It became apparent that there was a real contest between those who believed in adopting the new system without any carry-over tax and the extremists, who wanted to levy excessive carry-over taxes. Therefore, a compromise had to be reached or the establishment of a pay-as-you-go plan abandoned.

The Senate conferees brought to the conference a bill which had passed the Senate almost 2 to 1, with no carry-over taxes. The Senate conferees, as a compromise, suggested a carry-over tax of 25 percent of the 1942 tax liabilities, computed at the 1942 rates, to be paid in 1944 and 1945 in 2 installments of 12½ percent each year, but with a provision that all taxpayers whose taxes were less than $50 would be excepted from this carry-over tax. This compromise, after a deadlock of several days, was finally accepted by 11 of the 14 conferees.

The conference report, Mr. President, should be adopted, and the controversy over this question ended.

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the suggestion for a few moments?

Mr. O'DANIEL. Very well, I withhold the point of no quorum.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I should like to emphasize what has been said by members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate who have spoken on the conference report, and particularly to stress the earnest, devoted and patriotic service rendered by every member of the conference committee.

I may say, Mr. President, that the minority conferees of the conference committee on the part of the Senate were most helpful in working out the very best possible bill, as has been said, that could be written under all the circumstances.

I wish to pay my especial respects to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], as well as all the Democratic members of the conference committee representing the Senate.

I particularly wish to endorse all that has been said with reference to the highly courageous act of the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, the Honorable R. L. DOUGHTON, in making possible this bill, for finally he himself went all the way in order to make possible an agreement. Even that act would have been unavailing however, had it not been for the cooperative spirit of the minority members of the House conference committee, acting in conjunction with the Senate conferees, and especially the minority members of the Senate conference committee.

I wish, Mr. President, in this connection also to say that I appreciate the differences of point of view which have arisen over this important question and over the other important question which has today been disposed of by a vote of this body, to wit, the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I fully understand that there are deep convictions held by Senators on both sides of the aisle. I am very happy to think that in the renewal of the Trade Agreements Act there has not been a solid line-up along political lines, but many Senators on both sides have entertained the view that, for one reason or another, the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act seemed to them to be essential as a legislative measure.

I wish specifically to acknowledge my debt of gratitude to the distinguished leader of the minority, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who has cooperated at all times, although opposed to the Trade Agreements Act, in securing final votes upon all issues that arose during the consideration of the joint resolution.

I wish also to express my appreciation, Mr. President, to all members of the Senate who have likewise cooperated in an effort to bring to a speedy conclusion all the issues which honestly arose and existed upon the particular joint resolution.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote.

Mr. O'DANIEL. I renew my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

PERMISSION TO INTRODUCE AND DISCUSS A BILL

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I shall have to be away for several days after tomorrow. I request unanimous consent that at the beginning of the session tomorrow I may introduce a bill and discuss it or make an explanatory statement, which will take not more than 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? None is heard, and it is so ordered.

THE COAL STRIKE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement prepared by me with respect to the pending coal strike, and I request that following my statement there be printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Who's Boss?" appearing in the Washington Post of June 2, 1943.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in order that there shall not be any misunderstanding with respect to the Senator's request, and before unanimous consent is given, I desire to make it clear that I have no objection to having the Senator's statement printed in the body of the RECORD, provided it does not appear in RECORD type, but is printed in such a way as to show that it is a statement.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, that was my understanding. I used the word "statement"—a statement coming from the Senator from Virginia, to be inserted in the body of the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator meant that; but yesterday there was a slight misunderstanding with respect to a request by another Senator, and I do not want the previous situation to recur.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. HARRY FLOOD BYRD, OF VIRGINIA

Who is the boss of the United States of America? Is it John Lewis or President Roosevelt? Millions of Americans are asking this question.

On May 2 President Roosevelt delivered a solemn warning to the Nation calling for the resumption of coal mining and the stoppage of all strikes in defense industries. His words were brave and the principles he enunciated were of the highest patriotism. Using his powers as Commander in Chief, he took over the mines. The American flag was hoisted. He appointed Secretary Ickes to take charge. The American people then believed that at last the administration intended to come to grips with John L. Lewis. Twice before John L. Lewis had won victories over the administration. The average citizen said that Harold L. Ickes was a "tough guy" and he would tell John Lewis where to get off, but so far Mr. Ickes has spoken very softly and made rather humble requests of Mr. Lewis to resume the mining of coal.

The strongest condemnation Mr. Ickes has as yet made of Mr. Lewis was last night when he said, "The President of the United Mine Workers cannot escape the responsibility for the cessation of work today." Mr. Lewis was not even mentioned by name.

What hidden power has John L. Lewis so that he, and he alone, can defy the Government of the United States in an hour of the greatest peril this Nation has ever faced? Can anything be more destructive of the morale of those American boys who are fighting and dying on many foreign battlefields? Has the American flag which now flies over the coal mines of America lost its power and prestige?

We were told that no strike could occur against the United States Government. Mr. Ickes is operating the coal mines acting for the Government. The United States is the employer. Yet, today, in the third day of the strike, the Associated Press reports that 500,000 miners remain idle. Mr. Lewis has defied the War Labor Board. He has refused to appear before them or to negotiate directly with them. Piece by piece he is obtaining all that he has asked for. The actual awards have not been made—but concessions have been tendered him which indicate he will finally gain all that he has requested.

If Mr. Lewis can defy his Government and the American flag now and get by with it, what may happen when peace comes? Then America will go through the most difficult period of reconstruction of its American economy that has ever faced us. Then the seeds that are being sown today by the lack of courage and firmness on the part of the high Government officials may sprout to domestic chaos and strife. If Mr. Lewis can defy his Government in time of war, how can he be controlled in time of peace in the volcanic readjustment period following the war?

Congress has endeavored to pass antistrike legislation affecting those engaged in war industries. Just before Pearl Harbor the Smith bills were passed by the House of Representatives. Had these bills been enacted by the Senate and signed by the President, it is not likely the strikes would have occurred. This legislation was smothered in the Committee on Education and Labor on the direct request of the President and of Madam Perkins.

The Connally bill, on the point of passage in the Senate more than a year ago, was removed from the Senate calendar at the direct request of the President who said that the passage of the bill would be harmful to the war effort. It was passed a year later and is now before the House of Representatives.

I introduced legislation 60 days ago providing for "work or fight" of those striking in defense industries. Immediately the various departments of the Government opposed this legislation, saying that it would be harmful to national morale to require those to fight who have refused to work and produce materials for those who are fighting.

The winning of the war abroad will be delayed, with much greater loss of life unless we can control our domestic affairs at home. We cannot temporize any longer with this situation.

We must preserve at all costs constitutional government at home. We owe this to our sons who are fighting and dying on many foreign battlefields so that we may have this constitutional government.

[From the Washington Post of June 2, 1943]

WHO'S BOSS?

On May 2 the President in the most solemn address he has ever delivered to the Nation called for the resumption of coal mining. It had been stopped. The next day the miners trooped back to work. But they did not go back to work at the President's behest. They went back to work at the command of John L. Lewis. Twenty minutes before the President appeared in front of the microphone Lewis had waived the strike for 15 days. It was this order that the miners obeyed. They kept on mining coal when Mr. Lewis decreed a renewal of the truce, and they left the mines on Monday night in their entire strength when Mr. Lewis failed to renew the truce. There has thus been demonstrated what was unclear on May 3—that the miners look for guidance to Mr. Lewis and not to their President and Commander in Chief.

Why do the miners put the leader of their union ahead of their President? Why this extraordinary fealty to a man as if he is a god—to a man obsessed with a lust for personal power and a passion for vengeance against their President? Why should they seem so indifferent to the dire consequences of their action to their own kinsmen in uniform? Why should they endanger their own hearth and home in their country's struggle for survival? Why should honest and worthy Americans knowingly give aid and comfort to their enemies?

Surely it is not because of the force of their grievances. Those grievances are in a fair way to satisfaction. The President promised to improve the living conditions of the miners, and he has more than carried out his promise. Not only has food been made available up to the limit of the existing rations; supplementary rations have been authorized on the justifiable grounds that in virtue of their arduous occupation the miners need more than normal rations. Prices have been reduced where they have been above ceiling level. And the administration is asking Congress for authority to subsidize the reduction of ceiling prices on miners' necessities. Equal consideration has been given to the miners' wage demands. The War Labor Board's award, which was offered as the base for fresh bargaining between operators and miners, was extremely liberal, and met all legitimate grievances. Secretary Ickes ordered a 6-day week to come into operation immediately with time and a half for the sixth day. The miners even have the assurance that compensation for the sixth day will be paid when mechanical difficulties prevent work on the sixth day. Why, in view of this catalog, do the miners ignore the President and stop the production of coal?

The answer is that the miners are not free agents. In no organization on earth is there a more docile following than in that of the miners of America. It is not a question of gratitude only, though John L. Lewis has lifted the living standards of the miners as a result of the concessions he has won from the coal operators. The fact is that Lewis has the power of life and death over his miners. They are his creatures just as if they were the lieges of a feudal lord. The tragedy is that it was the President himself who delivered the miners into bondage to Mr. Lewis. This he did by setting up a special arbitration board 18 months ago to compel the nonunion miners to join Mr. Lewis' union. Now the livelihood of the miners is in the keeping of a man who owes no responsibility to anybody for his satrapy. There is no choice for the miners. He is their boss. The tolls of his tyranny over the miners are shown by the fact that the miners left their work not at his behest but because he had not given them permission to work beyond the truce. He can exert his will merely by failing to nod, equally by nodding. It is useless to rail at the miners till the Government saves them from this thralldom. The time has come to recommend legislation which will insure the democratic process in union management. The emendation of our labor laws providing for such changes as accountability for funds will be far more assurance to the miners of protection than a Presidential appeal to desert the leadership of this vengeful Pied Piper who now holds their lives and suffrages in the hollow of his hands.

At the same time the miners must be shown who is the real boss in this critical situation. They have never properly understood. The spectacle of the repeated obeisances to Mr. Lewis has reinforced their fear of Boss Lewis. They have seen him flout Government tribunals. They have seen him walk like Agag as a law unto himself. They have seen him take even the President's measure. How can we expect the miners to stand up to him when the Government itself has been afraid? Accordingly the President must accompany his order to the miners to go back to work not only with an explanation of the true facts of the situation but also with a demonstration of the supremacy of Government. Less than that would make the Government contemptible in the eyes of the citizenry. Less than that would mean the degeneration of our democracy into a mobocracy. It must be made clear, specifically, that any aid to the strikers in a strike against the Government at war is enjoinable. If this is not possible under existing law, it can be done by passing the Connally bill, and the administration should at once declare that it is back of that measure. A holdup of coal is a terrible threat to the lives of our soldiers and to our survival as a Nation which must be countered by the full strength and majesty of this Government.

CONFIRMATION BY THE SENATE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 575, to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate in the manner provided by the Constitution. I wish to say that in the event the bill shall be taken up I shall not press it until tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the motion now made is to proceed to the consideration of the confirmation bill, introduced by the Senator from Tennessee. I thought we were to proceed to the consideration of the lend-lease appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am moving to take the bill up, but shall not press it this afternoon, and tomorrow morning I shall ask permission temporarily to lay the bill aside and proceed with the lend-lease bill, which I hope may be passed in a few moments.

Mr. McNARY. If that procedure is followed, the able Senator from Tennessee then will have to obtain unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the confirmation bill. Suppose consent were not granted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it will be granted. That has been done in a hundred different cases in the last year or two. I anticipate no trouble about temporarily laying the bill aside, and I shall ask that that be done. I thought that while Senators were present this afternoon would be a good time to take the bill up. What I suggest is in accord with the usual practice.

Mr. McNARY. I am not disturbed by the situation, but it is customary to dispose of the appropriation bills before we undertake to legislate on bills on the calendar. I do not know why the procedure is somewhat reversed. Why does not the Senator move to take up the appropriation bill and dispose of that, and then take up the other bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I wanted to have the confirmation bill taken up while the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] the acting majority leader, was present. I knew that he was thinking of leaving the city, and I did not want the bill taken up in his absence.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator from Tennessee will lay aside his bill and take up the appropriation bill, as I am very anxious to get through with the appropriation bills, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Is that understood?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee. If he is to bring up the lend-lease bill tomorrow, I wish, if he can, through the Committee on Appropriations, he would get an answer to a question I have so that it will be available tomorrow when we take up the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall undertake to do so as best I can.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The question is, Have any lend-lease agreements been made since the recent extension of the act; and if so, may they be produced for our consideration?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall certainly try to produce them.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I think there is about to be a misunderstanding concerning the question of taking up the bill for consideration. I am quite interested in the bill which the Senator from Tennessee has moved to take up. So far as I am personally concerned I am perfectly willing to have it taken up in the morning and go on with it to a conclusion. I am not willing to agree that I shall not object to unanimous consent.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, are we about to act on a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). No. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to take up Senate bill 575.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to make a very brief statement for the RECORD?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, for many days past I have been attempting to get the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 35, which was introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and the purpose of which is to authorize the use for war purposes of silver held or owned by the United States. This measure received the unanimous approval of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and I, as the Senator in charge of the bill, have been besieged by certain silver manufacturing interests of the country, by the Treasury Department, and more particularly, by the War Production Board, to bring about at the earliest possible moment the consideration of this bill. I have been offered the generous cooperation of the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], and similar cooperation on the part of the acting majority leader, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. But deferring to the wishes of the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] I have not heretofore asked that the bill be considered because he is attempting to work out in a conference now in session a difficult problem—difficult from his viewpoint—in connection with silver.

I make this statement for the RECORD in order that those who are so much concerned and who insist that the need for silver for war purposes is very serious will know that the Senator from Connecticut has not been unmindful of their wishes and is giving constant attention, as best he can, to the situation.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Supplementing the request made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] of the Senator from Tennessee for information as to lend-lease matters, I also ask the Senator from Tennessee to be prepared to advise the Senate tomorrow, if he will kindly do so, as to what amounts of money have been transferred from the Army and Navy to lend-lease operations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very happy to give that information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 575.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I should like to take a few moments to make a statement. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee relates to the bill which would require Senate confirmation of appointees in the executive branch of the Government receiving more than $4,500 a year. That is, briefly and in substance, what the bill provides. I do not quite understand why the bill is so important that it must have the right-of-way over an appropriation bill which the Senator from Tennessee himself says will come up for consideration tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I simply wish to say to the Senator from New Mexico that the bill in question was reported to the Senate on April 14. I tried to get it up a number of times. I recall distinctly that one time the Senator from New Mexico would be unable to be present, and I let the bill go over on the request of the Senator in order that he could go to his home State. Since the bill has been before the Senate for nearly 2 months without action, and in view of the fact that action on it was voluntarily postponed by me at the request of the Senator from New Mexico, I am a little confused about the situation. I thought when the bill went over at the request of the Senator from New Mexico, so as to let the Senator visit his home without having the measure considered while he was away, that I had not pressed it unduly, in fact, I thought I had been exceedingly generous and kind to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is always generous and kind, but if the Senator from Tennessee thinks he has been more generous and kind to me than I have been to him——

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, Mr. President, I do not.

Mr. HATCH. Let him consult the members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no, I am not making any such claim.

Mr. HATCH. I do not know then what the Senator means by his statement concerning the previous postponement of consideration of the measure at my request. I desire postponement now. Do Senators know how long I want it postponed? Some Senator behind me says, "Forever." I do not know who it was, but so far as I am concerned he told the exact truth. I would postpone it forever. But I am not going to ask that of the Senate this afternoon. I do not have such a great personal interest in the bill. I have a fairly good idea as to what the Senator is going to do with it. But I dislike very much, Mr. President, that an appropriation bill must be made the second order of business in order that this measure may have the first place for our consideration, and that we shall be obliged to give unanimous consent to lay aside the bill in order to take up an appropriation bill.

Mr. President, I said that I might not give unanimous consent. I have only one voice in the Senate, and I am very much inclined to say right now that if the Senate adopts this procedure then I shall say that the Senate ought to finish the business which it thinks is so important. I am very much inclined to say that I would object to any unanimous-consent agreement to lay aside the bill for any purpose, although the bill is not very important.

Reverting again to the remark made by a Senator sitting behind me, I think the bill ought to be laid aside forever. But I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee, that we go ahead in an orderly manner, that we take up the appropriation bill tomorrow, which should be taken up then, and if the Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent now to take up his bill on Monday I shall not object to it now.

He can make the request at this time. Let the important business come first. Let first things be first things. If the Senator from Tennessee objects to that procedure, then I shall be inclined to object to a unanimous consent request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator understand that the Senator from Tennessee has requested unanimous consent for anything to which the Senator from New Mexico has a right to object?

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has moved that the Senate take up Senate bill 575, with the understanding that if his motion is agreed to and if the bill is made the pending business, he then will request unanimous consent that the pending business be laid aside, and that more important business be taken up.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, Mr. President, the Senator can object at any time he desires to do so, but I do not understand that he has a right to object to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to take up his bill.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from New Mexico is not objecting.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senator would not have a right to object, even if he wanted to.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator understands the parliamentary situation very well. He knows that the Senator from Tennessee has made his motion, and has made it on a condition.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that the Senator from New Mexico is opposing the motion of the Senator from Tennessee; but it seems to me that some confusion has been injected into this matter by the repeated threats of the Senator from New Mexico to object to something.

I understood that the Senator from Tennessee has made a motion upon which the Senate is entitled to act, and to which the Senator from New Mexico has no right to object.

Mr. HATCH. Has the Senator from Missouri finished his lecture? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was not delivering a lecture; I was asking the Senator from New Mexico a question. I understood that the Senator from New Mexico had the floor. I shall repeat the question if the Senator desires to have me do so.

Mr. HATCH. Yes, if the Senator will ask a question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Very well. The question is, Does the Senator from New Mexico maintain that he has a right to object to consideration of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator has proceeded far enough with the question. Let me say that the Senator from New Mexico stated he was not objecting, from the standpoint of objecting to the granting of unanimous consent, to the motion of the Senator from Tennesee. Of course, the Senator from Tennessee has a right to make his motion. I also have a right to speak on the motion; and if I care to threaten a little bit I have a right to do so, because I have learned it from the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield to me for a moment, let me say that there can be retaliatory threats fully as efficient as those of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. HATCH. If the Senator from Missouri has any in mind, I suggest that he make them now. I am not threatening the Senate of the United States, Mr. President; but I have a very definite reason for objecting to the particular procedure proposed, and simply as a matter of reason I ask whether there is not some point in the suggestion I make.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator is addressing his question to me, let me say that he stated a few moments ago that I had made a motion on condition. I had not made a motion on condition, Mr. President; I merely suggested that tomorrow, because of the importance of appropriation bills, and simply in following the usual custom, which I am sure has been observed hundred of times since I have been in the Senate, for a bill to be taken up and then be temporarily laid aside so that an appropriation bill or a conference report might be considered. I want to follow that course—the usual, ordinary, every-day course in the Senate in such matters.

But I make the motion, without any condition whatsoever that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 575. I think every Senator present knows what it would do; I think every Senator present is familiar with its provisions. I very sincerely hope that the Senators present will vote with me that the Senate proceed to consider the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Let me say that I am unalterably opposed to the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, and at the proper time I propose to have some things to say on the bill. Probably my remarks will not change any votes; I learned that a long time ago.

However, let me say that the consideration of the bill will not be any 10-minute affair. What I am objecting to, and what it seems to me we should take into consideration, is the matter of putting aside the lend-lease measure, which is a war measure, for a bill which has been pending for a long time. I should like to have the Senate proceed to consider the lend-lease bill. It is a bill which is in the interest of the war effort. I do not think we should delay its consideration, if it is ready to be taken up. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not press his motion; and I hope we shall proceed in the ordinary fashion, and shall take up the war measures which are ready to be considered, and afterward proceed to consider the bill of the Senator from Tennessee. It seems to me that is the proper course to follow. I merely make that suggestion.

Mr. McNARY. Question.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon is willing to vote; and, therefore, I am prompted to say that the reason why I said there was a condition attached to the motion was the statement made by the Senator from Oregon. I understood the Senator from Oregon to say that if the Senator from Tennessee would request unanimous consent that his bill be laid aside, so that the lend-lease appropriation bill could be taken up tomorrow, he would have no objection to agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. I take it, in view of the threats I have made, according to my friend the Senator from Missouri, that the Senator from Oregon may not be of that mind at this particular moment, in view of the fact that it is now my definite intention to object to any unanimous-consent agreement which may be requested.

I should like to interrogate the Senator from Oregon as to whether he is still of the same mind he was before.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am still of the same opinion.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am not unkind enough to say what came into my mind. [Laughter.]

I do not want to weary the Members of the Senate. If they think the bill of the Senator from Tennessee is of such importance that the Senate should vote now to make it the unfinished business, with the understanding that it be laid aside, and that then the Senate proceed to take up a bill which even the Senator from Tennessee says is more important business, I shall not try to inflict my views on the Senate. Certainly, if anything I have said could be construed as a threat to any Member of the Senate, I want to withdraw it. But, as a Senator—merely as one Senator—I shall have the right to take whatever course may seem best to me when any unanimous-consent agreement is proposed. I say to the Senate in all sincerity that I shall follow that course at the time. I do not desire to delay a vote. I request the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution.

INVESTIGATION OF DISTRIBUTION AND UTILIZATION OF MEDICAL PERSONNEL, FACILITIES, AND RELATED HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 74. This is the resolution which was considered yesterday. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asked that it go over for 1 day. It is my understanding that he has made an investigation and has no objection to its immediate consideration and adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 74) authorizing an investigation of the manpower resources of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor, with amendments, and subsequently reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an additional amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Edueation and Labor was, on page 1, line 1, to strike out—

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation in cooperation with the Manpower Commission and any other agency, or agencies, public or private, it might see fit to consult, of the manpower resources of the United States with particular reference to housing, health, education, technical training, civilian mobilization and morale, and how such manpower resources should—

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor or a subcommittee thereof to be appointed by the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee be authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation, in cooperation with such public and private agencies and such persons as it might see fit to consult regarding the distribution and utilization of medical personnel, facilities, and related health services: Be it further

Resolved, That the subcommittee be authorized and directed to study and investigate the deficiencies in health and education among persons otherwise fit for service with the armed forces and persons otherwise fit to—

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, on page 2, line 9, after the words "That the", to insert "said committee or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Education and Labor was, on page 2, line 13, after the word "industry", to strike out "the armed services."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 4, at the beginning of line 1, to strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the proposal. I remember that yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] objected to it.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, that objection has been cleared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor or a subcommittee thereof to be appointed by the chairman of the Education and Labor Committee be authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation, in cooperation with such public and private agencies and such persons as it might see fit to consult regarding the distribution and utilization of medical personnel, facilities, and related health services; be it further

Resolved, That the said committee or subcommittee be authorized and directed to study and investigate the deficiencies in health and education among persons otherwise fit for service with the armed forces and persons otherwise fit to be employed to the best advantage in agriculture, industry, and other activities so as consistently with the spirit of our institutions, and the national emergency best to promote the war and victory for our cause. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistance, to require by subpena, or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable.

That the heads of the executive departments and other executive agencies detail and/or engage personnel temporarily to assist the committee upon the request of the chairman. The committee may utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services as it may deem necessary. The committee may utilize the services of facilities of the various departments and agencies of the Government.

The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the subcommittee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the subcommittee.

The preamble, reported as an amendment by the Committee on Education and Labor, was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the needs of the armed services for medical personnel has brought about acute shortages of doctors, nurses, dentists, and allied personnel in many areas; and

Whereas many centers of war production lack adequate facilities for the maintenance of health; and

Whereas a large number of men have been rejected for military service because of physical or educational deficiencies; and

Whereas the physical and mental fitness of the Nation has a direct bearing upon the efficiency of both the armed forces and civilian efforts in the effective prosecution of the war: Therefore be it

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I move that the title be amended so as to read, "A resolution (S. Res. 74) authorizing an investigation of the educational and physical fitness of the civilian population as related to national defense."

The amendment of the title was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 2, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and most merciful Father, in the solemnity of these moments we wait in the name of Him who was bruised for our iniquities; harken unto the voice of our petition and consider our meditation. As we tarry in this silence, we feel the sense of a world gone wrong, which has failed because of hopes wasted and truth outraged. Whatever this tragedy has taken from us, may we never lose faith in the Lord Jesus as our Saviour; grieved by ruinous events, O increase our power to trust, to wait and hope for vision and victory.

Let us not presume that wickedness wins any immunity from punishment. Pride and power, glee and glory of successful iniquity, all shall reap the vintage and stubble of the wicked. We would not be blinded by sinister splendor, nor misinterpret divine patience or ripening judgment. Listen, O man, unto the word of the Lord: "I have seen the wicked in great power and spreading himself like a green bay tree. Yet he passed away and lo, he was not, he was sought and could not be found." Heavenly Father, brighten our pathway and allow not material glory to betray us, nor the intoxication of ambition to lure us to take any fatal step. Speak condemnation upon any who imperil the cornerstone of our Republic, or retard or threaten the heralds of freedom. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 367. An act for the relief of dependents of Frank Edward Dace.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 2584) entitled "An act to abolish certain naval trust funds and deposits thereto, and to simplify naval accounting procedure, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WALSH, Mr. TYDINGS, and Mr. DAVIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 495) entitled "An act to establish a Women's Army Auxiliary Corps for service in the Army of the United States," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, Mr. AUSTIN, and Mr. BRIDGES to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECRUITMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF FARM LABOR

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2848) amending the joint resolution making an appropriatior to assist in providing a supply and distribution of farm labor for the calendar year 1943, approved April 29, 1943.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] to explain what this resolution is about and the reason for its coming here at this time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the House joint resolution, as enacted, provided authorization for recruitment and distribution of farm labor. It was also provided in the resolution that all receiving old-age assistance be allowed to draw both assistance and any wages that they might be entitled to receive under the resolution at the rate in effect in the various States in the month of April 1942.

By a singular coincidence, almost on the day the Congress passed this law, the State Legislature of the State of California passed a law increasing the rate of old-age assistance in that State. As a result this law applies to all the States of the Union with the single exception of the State of California. This joint resolution merely amends the original joint resolution by moving the date from April to July and, without prejudicing in any particular. The sole effect of this joint resolution is to make applicable to the State of California as well as to the other 47 States.

Mr. TABER. This is simply for the purpose of permitting the persons who draw old-age assistance and who desire to go to work on the farm to still draw their old-age assistance, and the reason for substituting the month of July for April is so they can still do it without a change in the amount of old-age assistance that has taken place since the original bill was drawn.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is correct. The only change in the law proposed by the pending joint resolution is to make the law applicable to the State of California as it is to all other States of the Union.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say to the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], that I introduced a few minutes ago this bill (H. R. 2848) amending the joint resolution making an appropriation to assist in providing a supply and distribution of farm labor for the calendar year 1943, approved April 29, 1943, reading as follows:

That section 5 (f) of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation to assist in providing a supply and distribution of farm labor for the calendar year 1943," approved April 29, 1943 (Public Law No. 45, 77th Cong.), is amended by striking out "April" and inserting in lieu thereof "July."

I want to thank the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] for his cooperation and help in calling this bill up at once. This is an emergency matter. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has stated the case very accurately. Under the provisions of Public Law No. 45, Seventy-eighth Congress, no individual receiving old-age assistance would be permitted to accept any income arising from agricultural labor if the old-age assistance was paid at a rate in excess of the rate received during the month of April 1943. The State legislature of the State of California increased the amount of old-age assistance during the month of April last, therefore under the provisions of this act the individuals would not be eligible to receive income from agricultural labor. My bill simply strikes out the word "April" and substitutes the word "July," because by that time an individual receiving old-age assistance in the State of California will be receiving the increased amount and will therefore be permitted to work in agricultural labor without any penalty levied against his old-age assistance.

The State of California considers this matter of such vital importance that it has sent a delegation here to Washington consisting of State Senator Jerrold Seawell, Senator Jesse Mayo, Senator Jack Shelley, and Assemblyman Walter Fourt. Yesterday with this delegation I conferred at length with Mr. Oscar Powell of the Social Security Board. The situation was thoroughly discussed, and the amendment that I have offered was recommended. I understand that my amendment will make it possible for the agriculture interests to employ some 25,000 or 30,000 individuals in California this season that would be barred from accepting this employment unless my amendment is adopted. The individuals affected cannot draw the old-age assistance and the additional compensation obtained from work in agriculture unless this amendment goes through.

The special delegation consisting of three State senators and the assemblyman has been most helpful in working out the solution of this matter.

I want to express my thanks and appreciation not alone to the Speaker, the majority and minority floor leaders, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] for the helpful cooperation, but also to the ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

This is a fair and just amendment, and I am sure that it will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA], the dean of the California delegation.

Mr. LEA. The California delegation has taken a great deal of interest in this problem. The matter happened as the chairman has stated. The California delegation was not familiar with what had been done at the time the matter was up, but so far as I know, every member of our delegation is in favor of this amendment. The main feature is that it permits these aged people to engage in agricultural work without having reductions made from their pensions during the war period.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. Is the amendment limited to people in the State of California?

Mr. TABER. No; it is not.

Mr. CASE. The reason I ask that question is that it has been brought to my attention that a great many Indians who are past 60 or 65 years of age and who are drawing old-age assistance would be available for farm labor in my State were it not for the fact reductions will be made, they will be taken from the rolls and reinvestigated.

Mr. TABER. It makes no exception.

Mr. CASE. Does it permit a recipient of old-age assistance who earns up to $40, which would be the maximum allowable under the social-security law, to continue to draw that without any reductions?

Mr. TABER. It does not make any difference how much they are receiving, they are entitled to still draw old-age assistance and work on a farm, and it does not make any difference what State they are in.

Mr. CASE. Suppose they are Indians, would they be entitled to the same rights?

Mr. TABER. It does not make any difference who they are.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would like to ask this question: Is the change as proposed in the resolution the only change; there is no other change in the phraseology of the resolution?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is correct. The only change is to substitute the month of July for the month of April in order to put the rates of old-age assistance into effect subsequent to the enactment of the California legislature.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The reason for making that change and for setting the State back, is to permit the State of California to participate under the law on the same basis that is extended to all other States?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is correct. Without this amendment the State of California is not admitted to the full benefits of the law. With this amendment the law applies alike to every State, including California.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If this is done it will relieve between 18,000 and 20,000 Californians who are receiving pensions at present under social security for agricultural activities, and that is the purpose.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is the sole purpose. It will increase the amount of labor available, and also provide for equal benefits to those drawing old-age assistance in California along with those on the rolls in the rest of the country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think it is a splendid amendment and should be adopted.

Mr. TABER. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I do so only for the purpose of securing information that I find very desirable at this time, may I ask the chairman of the committee this. I know that special treatment is given the State of California.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No special treatment is given the State of California or any other State. The bill merely provides that the State of California, which without the passage of this law would be excepted, shall receive the same consideration received by every other State in the Union.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I realize fully that the conditions in California are somewhat different than they are in the other States.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit, the only difference is that California happened, by coincidence, just at the time this law was enacted, to pass a law increasing its rate of old-age assistance. In view of the fact that the Federal law provided that the rates in effect in April should prevail, this took California out of the purview of the Federal enactment. California did not know what we were doing and we did not know what California was doing.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I understand that.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. This resolution merely remedies that discrepancy.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the bill now pending extends the same benefits to those drawing old-age pensions in the several States everywhere throughout the country?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Exactly.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. It does not play favorites anywhere?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If this bill is not passed, California becomes an exception, but if this bill is passed, the same law obtains uniformly throughout the country.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. May I say that California is discriminated against if this bill does not pass, because none of the other States happens to have increased its pensions at that particular time. We do not believe we ought to be penalized for increasing our pensions.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I may say to the gentleman from California that I am clearly in harmony with the purpose of the bill.

I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 (f) of the joint resolution entitled "Joint Resolution Making an Appropriation to Assist in Providing a Supply and Distribution of Farm Labor for the Calendar Year 1943," approved April 29, 1943 (Public Law No. 45, 78th Cong.), is amended by striking out "April" and inserting in lieu thereof "July."

USE AND OPERATION OF WAR PLANTS IN PROSECUTION OF WAR

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]; and pending that, I yield 3 minutes to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY].

Mr. MAY. Mr Speaker, I have been requested to make a statement with respect to the procedure of your committee more than to the provisions of this bill.

The House Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill several days ago. Subsequent to the reporting of the bill, which was approved by a vote of 21 to 0, there were certain officials in the Government in some of the bureaus downtown who addressed a letter to the Speaker of the House and likewise a letter to me as chairman of the committee expressing opposition to some features of the legislation, and suggestions as to other features of it. Let me state now that when I opened hearings on the subject of available manpower for war needs and on what was known as the Smith bill, the Colmer bill, the Austin-Wadsworth bill, and the Connally bill I wrote letters to all of the labor leaders whom I knew, or the principle ones at least, inviting them to express their views and to come before the committee to be heard. I received courteous letters of acknowledgment from Mr. William Green, from John L. Lewis, and from Phillip Murray, stating that they would send representatives; and they did, and at least two-thirds of the 1,068 pages of testimony which are now available was devoted to the study of the antistrike legislation and related questions.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Not now; I will yield later if I have time.

Then we received this letter protesting against the legislation after a request from one of the ranking members of the House Military Affairs Committee. I might just as well make it personal and say the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] requested that I open hearings on the question of whether or not the committee would submit amendments. I then conferred with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON], ranking majority Member. At the suggestion of these two gentlemen, or rather on my own judgment, after conference with them, in an effort to be fair to the Bureaus and to the Bureau chiefs, I opened hearings yesterday and today, as a result of which we will present several amendments which largely meet their views.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the rule. This is the first rule that has been reported out of the Committee on Rules that I have opposed on the floor of the House during this session of the Congress and therefore I propose to explain in detail my reasons for opposing this specific rule. When we had a meeting of the Committee on Rules to consider granting a rule to make in order this legislation I asked the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], who just addressed the House, whether the heads of the great labor organizations had been invited to appear before his committee on the Smith-Connally bill, and if they had appeared. His answer was that he had invited them but had not heard from them.

I hold in my hand a telegram from the president of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. William Green, addressed to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], and sent from Washington on May 8 in reply to the invitation. In this telegram Mr. Green says:

> I earnestly request that your committee accord representatives of the American Federation of Labor an opportunity to be heard in opposition to Senate bill 796. This measure is highly objectionable to labor. Please advise when an opportunity to be heard in opposition to this bill will be accorded representatives of the American Federation of Labor.

I am opposing the rule and the consideration of the Smith-Connally bill at this time because the representatives of 12,000,000 wage earners, loyal American wage earners, were refused an opportunity to be heard on this bill affecting collective bargaining and the fundamental legislative rights of labor obtained step by step during the past 50 years.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. When I have completed my statement, I will yield. This is the first time such a thing has happened in the history of this Congress. Naturally, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], came before our committee and made no mention of this telegram I withdrew my opposition as a member of the Committee on Rules and took no part in the proceedings because I saw no reason why I should fight the battles of labor if they did not care enough to participate in them themselves.

That was not the fact, according to the telegram from Mr. Green, and I have checked it up since in all details or I would not mention it here today. The fact is that no representatives of labor were heard on the Smith-Connally bill at any time and that in itself should be sufficient reason to vote against the rule. The members of the Military Affairs Committee are here and they know the facts and I venture to say that none of them will sustain the statement of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman, of course, heard me tell Mr. Hines in the Rules Committee at the time that I had not received that telegram and if the gentleman will read the testimony he will find that Mr. Hines testified for at least 20 pages as the representative of the American Federation of Labor. It is all in the RECORD. There were five other witnesses of the American Federation of Labor included in the hearing who testified at length and I asked them if they wanted to add anything further to their testimony.

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield further. Mr. Hines told me that the gentleman admitted he was confused when he made that statement in the Rules Commiteee and that he had received this telegram. I asked him that question and he said he had not and furthermore Mr. Hines told me personally that he never was afforded an opportunity to testify on the Smith-Connally bill.

Mr. Speaker, the first reason I am opposed to adopting the rule is that no representatives of labor were heard against the bill reported by the Military Affairs Committee, and I hope I have made that clear. Maybe they were heard on other bills introduced 6 months or a year ago or perhaps by the author of this bill, but not on the provisions of the pending measure. If the time has come that a committee of the House of Representatives refuses to hear representatives of patriotic American labor organizations of the American Federation of Labor, the Railroad Brotherhoods, and all of them, then I think it is about time that we hold up this legislation until they are heard. That is my first plea.

My second reason is that those in authority, those public officials who have the main responsibility for the conduct of the war, for winning the war, which is the greatest objective now before the American people, all of them are united in saying that this bill in its present form will impair the war effort, that it may provoke strikes, that it may cause dissension and disunity in labor and seriously impede or lessen the production of weapons necessary in winning the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I hope in the consideration of this bill no one will impugn the patriotism of the American wage earners and of organized labor. One million sons of the American Federation of Labor members and their relatives are in the armed forces of the United States. Ninety thousand members or sons of members of the United Mine Workers are in war service, and so on down the line. They have loyally contributed in blood, bonds, and tears to help win the war.

Everybody in authority in this country from the President down, every single high official has testified, the War Department, the Navy Department, the War Production Board, and James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, that labor not only has been loyal but has made a tremendous and unprecedented record for production of war weapons and war supplies for our own armed forces and those of our allies. There is not a Member of Congress who does not know that we have in every case increased production beyond the dreams of the most optimistic in airplanes, in tanks, in guns, equipment, and ships to win the war. The record of labor for war production excels all the rest because they are primarily responsible for it and a right to be proud of it. We are winning this war on production.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the rule will be voted down so that free American labor can have a fair hearing on legislation affecting their rights, interests, and welfare, and at least be afforded an opportunity to express their views on such legislation. I believe that with open hearings a bill can be written that will be workable and will not create disunity and dissension in the ranks of labor, be harmful to production, and imperil our war effort but rather promote the war effort and help win the war. The following are a half dozen specific reasons why I am opposing the pending rule and urging its defeat.

I am opposed to the consideration of the Connally-Smith bill, S. 796, under the rule, as the departments and agencies of the Government that have a direct responsibility in the conduct of the war and the settlement of labor disputes are opposed to it in its present form.

I am opposed to its consideration in view of the fact that the labor organizations, such as the American Federation of Labor, which is opposed to this bill, did not have an opportunity to present their views before the Committee on Military Affairs.

I am opposed to it because it will legalize strikes and may provoke labor disputes or strikes and impair our war efforts by lessening production. No single official of the administration who has to do with the Army or the Navy, winning the war, increasing production, or settling labor disputes has shown the necessity for such legislation nor advocated its passage.

I am opposed to it because it is very similar to the Smith bill, in principle, which passed the House of Representatives 18 months ago, and upon which the Senate took no action, which measure I voted for at the time, as it was aimed to stop Communist-inspired strikes which had been prevalent throughout the Nation.

I am opposed to the consideration of the bill under the rule as I believe that the whole subject matter should go back to the committee from which it originated, open hearings should be held, and labor given an opportunity to suggest amendments to protect their rights to collective bargaining, as well as those who have charge of the conduct of the war, in order to work out a feasible and practical bill that would have practically the united support of all fair-minded Americans.

I am opposed to the consideration of the bill under the rule, as it would be an antilabor measure in its present form, and would undoubtedly meet the same treatment in the Senate as its predecessor, the Smith bill, which passed the House in December 1941.

This proposed legislation is of such vital importance that it should be more carefully considered, free from war hysteria and personal rancor, for the best interests of the country, increased production, and winning the war.

I resent any attempts to harrass or impugn the motives of loyal American wage earners whose sons are fighting in our armed forces over all the world, and who have very generally adhered to the no-strike pledge of their various organizations. It may well be, however, if this pledge is repudiated and Nation-wide strikes affecting war industries become prevalent, and the necessity of such legislation is shown at the hearings before the committee, that I would join with others who are proposing consideration of this legislation under the rule now; I might support any antistrike legislation that may then be necessary to help win the war.

In view of these facts, and since none of the high officials of the departments and agencies of the Government that have the responsibility for the conduct of the war and the production of war weapons have supported this bill or advocated its passage in its present form, I feel that Members of Congress of both parties should vote the rule down, and thereby open the way for the consideration of any remedial legislation that would eliminate strikes during the war and promote better harmony between labor and management in the interest of the American people, and to insure victory at the earliest possible moment with the least possible casualties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose this rule. I believe I am justified in so doing because of the manner in which the House version of S. 796 was conceived. Because of the limited time on the rule I cannot go into detail. However, if the rule should prevail I will go into the bill's history thoroughly, so as to acquaint you with all the facts as I know them.

While I voted in committee to report this bill out I did so because I am one of those who do not believe in "pickling" any major bill—or a bill of this kind which affects so many people—because I or anyone else disagrees with its provisions.

I want to say to the House, however, that the subject matter of the House substitute for S. 796 contains nothing whatsoever of the subject matter of the four bills which we had under consideration for so many weeks. No testimony, therefore, came before us which could guide us in the formation of the current House bill.

As a matter of fact, the testimony given us by Under Secretary of War Patterson and Admiral Land on the Wadsworth-Austin bill had nothing whatever to do with this bill as is evidenced by both of these very well thought of officials signing a letter on May 15 to Speaker RAYBURN protesting against the passage of this bill we are now about to consider.

My colleagues, when those charged with the procurement of our war supplies say that the passage of this bill will hinder rather than help the war effort; when they say that the morale of the American workers will be lowered by the enactment of this proposition—we better go slow.

The Under Secretary of War, Judge Patterson, for the War Department, Secretary Knox of the Navy Department, Admiral Land of the Maritime Commission, and Donald Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board, have all denounced this proposed legislation and they are the backbone of our production and procurement.

Likewise those whose duty it is to deal with the problems of Labor are advising us of the mistake we will make if this bill is passed. I refer to the Secretary of Labor, the War Labor Board, and the National Labor Relations Board. All of them have said that it will hinder their work rather than help them.

All of the great American labor organizations are protesting against the passage of this bill. Their morale has been superb, as can be seen by the results of our production. We will, by the passage of this bill, put their morale and production efforts in reverse and by so doing will give aid and comfort to our enemies.

An analysis of S. 796 by the American Federation of Labor, as of yesterday, June 1, very clearly demonstrates this. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I place in the RECORD at this point the full text of this analysis. In view of all the evidence from authorities such as I have mentioned, I trust the rule will be defeated:

ANALYSIS OF AND COMMENTS ON SMITH-CONNALLY BILL, S. 796, BY THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The bill is a hodgepodge of antilabor measures, many of which have no relationship whatsoever to the war effort. The bill tramples upon and violates almost every right which labor has gained after years of struggle. It is a bitter reward for the contributions that labor has made to the present war effort whereunder seemingly impossible production records have been achieved. No greater or more unmerited blow to the morale of millions of patriotic American workers can be conceived than that inflicted by the present bill. The bill will inevitably interfere with war production and stimulate industrial unrest, and the effectiveness of existing machinery for the orderly settlement of labor disputes will be impaired if not destroyed.

The report accompanying the bill states that the legislation is necessary because of the crisis in the coal mines. Aside from the fact that the Government has taken appropriate action and now operates the mines, the provisions of the bill are not limited to the coal industry but apply to every plant producing materials needed in or helpful to the war effort, and apply to millions of American workers in addition to the comparatively few working in the coal mines. Compulsory legislation prohibiting strikes is not necessary to achieve maximum production. Existing voluntary procedures have not only proved sufficient but have operated to make possible the greatest production record in the history of this or any other country. Organized labor has lived up to its no-strike pledge to the fullest possible extent, and even those few unauthorized stoppages which have occurred have caused a total man-days' loss of only a fraction of that occurring in time of peace and is less than half of that occurring in Great Britain. Time and again our war leaders and production heads, in praising the production achievements of organized labor, have declared that the time which has been lost was unavoidable and that labor has fulfilled its no-strike obligation to the fullest extent humanly possible. The production records speak for themselves in this respect. The passage of this bill would constitute an absolutely unwarranted reflection upon millions of American workers and would impugn the patriotism of millions of union members whose brothers, sons, and fathers are on our fighting fronts.

Let us analyze some of the provisions of the bill.

Section 2 prohibits strikes for a 30-day cooling-off period. Organized labor has already voluntarily given up the right to strike and has lived up to its pledge in this respect, which in itself makes such a provision unnecessary. Compulsory abandonment of the right to strike amounts to involuntary servitude—a condition that has not and will not be tolerated by organized labor and prohibited by the United States Constitution.

Section 3 of the bill requires a majority vote to engage in a strike after the 30-day "cooling off" period. Such a provision reflects directly and unwarrantedly on the integrity and responsibility of the many thousands of union leaders throughout the country. Unions, by their own elections, themselves repose responsibility in their officers to determine the policy and conduct the affairs of the membership. However, the most important objection to this provision is the fact that it denies to minorities their moral and legal rights to quit in concert and declare their grievances to the world. The mere fact that only 450 of a thousand employees are agreed upon a strike and agreed upon the grievances that give rise to the strike is no reason to deny them their rights because 550 think otherwise. The right of a minority to strike is not dependent upon the will of a majority; it is not equivalent to elections to office. The right to strike, like all basic constitutional rights, is an individual and collective right not subject to dictates by any group, majority, or otherwise. It is protected by the Constitution in the same manner as religious worship, freedom of speech, peaceable assembly, and similar rights.

Section 4 (a) forbids force or violence in connection with a labor dispute in a war plant. This, of course, is entirely unnecessary since force or violence is nowhere lawful in the United States. Its necessary result is for antilabor employers to encourage violence on the picket line through the use of professional provocateurs and thus deprive workers of their rights under the Wagner Act.

Section 4 (b) prohibits peaceful picketing before a "house or place where a person resides." This is clearly in violation of the first amendment which prevents Congress from the passing of law abridging freedom of speech and of assembly.

Section 4 (c) prohibits any but so-called bona fide employees from engaging in peaceful picketing. This is a direct throw-back to the reactionary days where labor disputes were in effect limited to disputes between an employer and his immediate employees. In other words, this section prohibits so-called stranger picketing and is in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States for the same reasons as noted above. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent case of American Federation of Labor v. Swing, said that "A State cannot exclude workingmen from peacefully exercising the rights of free communication by drawing the circle of economic competition between employers and workers so small as to contain only an employer and those directly employed by him. The interdependence of economic interest of all engaged in the same industry has become a commonplace."

Section 5 (a) outlaws the boycott. Unions may not strike any person—regardless of whether or not he be a defense contractor—or refuse to work on or handle the products of such person in an effort to induce a defense contractor to deal with the union. Thus, if a defense contractor be on the unfair list and has among his customers employers who are in no way involved in the defense program, the union, nevertheless, may not strike or picket such customer. There is no conceivable connection between this provision and the defense program. The purpose of this provision, too, is primarily to reduce labor's basic constitutional rights.

Section 5 (b) prohibits strikes and other concerted activities on the part of unions against a defense contractor calculated to displace another union that has a collective bargaining agreement. While this provision is undoubtedly aimed at jurisdictional and interunion disputes, it would also by its terms tend to freeze collective bargaining relationships between the employers and company unions and to restrict freedom of choice of employees under existing contracts.

Section 6 deals with enforcement. 6 (a) amends the Norris-LaGuardia Act so as to permit ex parte injunctions for violation of any of the preceding sections. Thus, the dictatorial rule of government by injunction is revived in a purported national effort to fight dictatorships. Section 6 (b) adds to the penalties by permitting civil actions for damages by employers for violation of the preceding sections. Here is revealed the true spirit and purpose of this bill, namely, to weaken and destroy labor unions. It can superficially be argued that the prevention of strikes is necessary as an emergency measure in order to avoid interruptions in defense production. But surely, there is no connection between the continuous flow of defense production and enriching employers by giving them private suits wherewith they will seek to deplete union treasuries.

But that is not all. Section 6 (c) imposes additional penalties on individuals who are found to have violated the preceding sections. First, an employee loses his status as an employee or as a representative under the Wagner Act. Second, employees lose all benefits under "any act making appropriations for relief purposes"; and third, section 6 (d) completes the picture by providing that, if any individual violating the preceding sections is an officer or representative of a labor organization, then the organization itself loses its status under the Wagner Act and under the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Section 7 deals with compulsory registration of all labor organizations with the National Labor Relations Board. It requires filing information on almost every detail of internal union affairs. Failure to comply disqualifies the labor organization to act as collective bargaining agent.

It should be noted that in England registration of labor organizations is entirely voluntary and carries with it certain stated benefits. This provision, which can only remotely be connected with the national defense program, does not, of course, extend any benefits to labor organizations and makes it compulsory for them to register. From the tenor of the entire bill, as well as the spirit of those who sponsor and favor it, it is fair to say that the direct aim of these provisions is to accumulate sufficient data about labor organizations so as to facilitate procedures for destroying these labor organizations.

No other voluntary trade association, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, chambers of commerce, or employer associations are required to register and disclose their internal affairs. If such legislation is proper, then it is likewise proper to require the disclosure of the internal affairs of all clubs, societies, mutual benefit associations or any other type of voluntary association.

Sections 8 and 9 give the War Labor Board authority to hear and determine labor disputes affecting the war effort, but it is provided that the Board cannot direct that a closed or union shop clause be incorporated in any labor agreement directed by it. Labor has not asked the Government to compel the union or closed shop; the Government should not seek to compel a compulsory open shop. The matter is one which should be left to the discretion of the War Labor Board, dependent upon the facts of each particular case. Under this provision, upon the expiration of existing union shop agreements employers may refuse to renew them, and labor, under its no-strike pledge, would have no way of maintaining the security which perhaps had been won only after long struggles. Is it equitable to permit any company to take advantage of the no-strike agreement to throw out a union shop previously established by agreements between the parties? In the Harvill Aircraft Die Casting Corporation case the War Labor Board determined that "Likewise, to push union shops back into open shops would unstabilize, for war production, the unions of the millions of American workers who have pledged themselves not to strike but to leave to peaceful arbitrament the security of the unions which they have won after long and arduous struggles."

Section 10 empowers the War Labor Board to prohibit strikes in any plant in which a dispute has arisen, and the prohibition on striking can last as long as 60 days. The order is enforceable by injunctive decree obtained by the Attorney General in the Federal courts, and the Norris-LaGuardia Act is amended to permit courts to issue labor injunctions. This section is objectionable for the same reason that section 2, providing for a "cooling off" period, is objectionable; it constitutes involuntary servitude and is entirely unnecessary in view of the no-strike pledge.

Under section 13 of the bill it is made a crime punishable by heavy fine or a year's imprisonment, or both, for any person "to instigate or induce any interference or other interruption" with a plant taken over by the Government. Any just protest against intolerable conditions voiced by one worker to another, let alone to an assemblage of his fellow workers, could be classified as an "inducement" or an "instigation" or an "interference" with the operation of a business. It matters not whether such worker be union official, union member, or neither; indeed, if a protest is made by a union representative upon request of workers whom he was chosen to represent, the crime presumably would be conclusive. Under this section not only is a condition of involuntary servitude imposed but, even worse, persons who already have had their right to a strike outlawed would be hazarding their liberties by making any protests or by taking any concerted action against any grievance, no matter how great the provocation. Surely, personal liberty and liberty of speech is what we are fighting to preserve, not destroy.

Subsection a (2) of section 13 makes it a crime for any person to aid an interruption by giving direction or guidance or providing funds. Under this section an international union could maintain ordinary correspondence or intercourse with an affiliated local that might be involved in a work interruption at a Government-operated plant only at its peril, and the payment of ordinary salaries as required by constitutional provisions in such cases might well constitute a crime.

It is no comfort to provide in section 13 that any individual shall have the right to cease work when that individual is forbidden to discuss lawful grievances with a fellow worker or workers and quit employment in concert with him or them. This proviso merely restores the ancient doctrine of conspiracy under which organized labor, early in its history, suffered so much abuse at the hands of the courts.

The Smith-Connally bill is wrong in principle, is entirely lacking in necessity, is unjust in application, and constitutes a gratuitous insult to millions of American workers who are expending every effort on the production fronts. At very best, as stated by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, the provisions of the bill "constitute a club—a vengeful weapon aimed at all American workers in retaliation for the acts of a few. American workers will not and cannot subject themselves to such tyranny. This measure, if enacted into law, will wreck the war production program. It will wipe out the vast benefits that have been derived from the operation of labor's voluntary no-strike pledge. It will be as unenforceable as prohibition. How can American workers join whole-heartedly in a war for the preservation of freedom when their own freedoms are being cut out from under them? How can American workers believe in the sincerity of America's war against Fascism, when Fascist legislation is being imposed against them?"

If any person believes that war production would be increased by passage of the bill, or that the morale of the American worker would thereby be raised, he is seriously mistaken. Not only is the voice of 12,000,000 organized workers raised against passage of this bill, but the leaders of our war program both on the military and production front and the heads of all governmental agencies and tribunals dealing with labor relations have unanimously condemned the bill as constituting an interference with the war effort and have requested and urged the Members of Congress to vote against its passage. In a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House, the chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs and the majority leader of the House, and signed by the War, Navy, and Labor Departments, the Maritime Commission, the War Production Board, the National Labor Relations Board, and the National War Labor Board, it was stated that "the committee bill proposes drastic and far-reaching changes in the overall machinery and principles established by statute, Executive order, and mutual agreement, for dealing with labor relations in the war period. According to the committee report, these changes are imperative because of the emergency which may arise from the current dispute in the coal industry. But the bill in its terms is not limited to that industry and therefore must be appraised with respect to its impact upon the whole field of industrial production. While recognizing the gravity of the coal mining situation, and without attempting to suggest here what specific steps should be taken in dealing with that situation, we note that since the Government has taken possession of the coal mines, only a few sections of the bill have any bearing upon that particular dispute. The bill relates to American industry generally and to the whole problem of maintaining industrial peace in time of war. It is accordingly felt that in evaluating the bill our judgment should not be obscured by the exception presented by the coal mining situation to an otherwise unprecedented record of industrial peace since Pearl Harbor. Although a number of strikes have occurred since the declaration of war, they have, with very few exceptions, been unauthorized stoppages of short duration opposed by the responsible leadership of organized labor, and the total man-days lost have been less than at any other time in our industrial history.

The bill contains numerous coercive provisions, including injunctions and criminal penalties. At the same time it impliedly recognizes the propriety of strikes after a 30-day notice and a secret ballot. In both these respects the bill runs squarely counter to the national policy embodied in the voluntary and unconditional no-strike agreement entered into by industry and labor with the President immediately after Pearl Harbor. This agreement, which represents the cornerstone of our wartime industrial relations structure, has been supplemented in a number of industries by written agreements outlawing strikes and lock-outs for the period of the war. This nationally accepted arrangement, whereby strikes and lock-outs have been outlawed by voluntary action, has proven by experience so satisfactory that a change in the arrangement should be approached with greatest caution. It would seem unwise in time of war to experiment with an untried substitute for a policy whose worth is already demonstrated.

"The absence of any comment in this letter on other features of the bill does not necessarily imply approval of those features. The shortage of time has prevented the preparation and submission of any joint detailed analysis. Some of the undersigned agencies will, however, submit comment on certain sections of the bill bearing on problems respecting which they have special knowledge and experience."

Such an expression of disapproval by governmental war and labor agencies should be conclusive.

On May 18 the American Federation of Labor formally reaffirmed its no-strike pledge "as a valid and compelling obligation, come what may." It was stated, "No strike will be authorized or approved by the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions until the enemies of America have been crushed into final defeat."

This week President Roosevelt reports that America is producing more fighting planes than all of the enemy nations combined; Secretary of the Navy Knox announces that virtually an entire new navy was launched in the first few months of this year; merchant ships are sliding down the ways at a rate never before approached in shipbuilding history; a virtual avalanche of guns, tanks, and ammunition, unsurpassed in quality, is pouring forth from American factories. Production has reached such staggering quantities that Donald Nelson acknowledges there is no further need of expanding plant capacity.

Organized labor takes pride in this accomplishment. The American worker neither expects nor merits restrictive, stultifying legislation such as the Smith-Connally bill as its reward. Such legislation not only constitutes a completely unwarranted reflection upon the patriotism of the American worker and would result in an incalculable blow to morale, inevitably and seriously impairing production, but constitutes a restriction of the very liberties to preserve which we are fighting this war and would be a definite step in the direction of that form of government imposed upon the people of the enemy countries by their dictators.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include a statement of the American Federation of Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House votes down this rule and it will be justified in so doing because, despite what might be said, for all practical purposes there were no hearings on this particular piece of legislation. Most of the Members of the House, in my opinion, were startled when they learned a few days after the passage of this bill in the Senate that it had suddenly been reported by the Military Affairs Committee of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill are similar to the provisions of a bill that we had before the Naval Affairs Committee last year. We had hearings for 3 months or more on that particular bill. The Secretary of the Navy, Donald Nelson, Admiral Land, and various Cabinet officers appeared before our committee and not one of them advocated the passage of that particular bill. After extensive and impartial hearings the Naval Affairs Committee refused to approve the bill. That legislation is now incorporated in the measure which would be considered if this rule is adopted.

Mr. Speaker, those who advocate this do not need a war to induce them to come before you as proponents of this legislation. They are the same ones who for the last 5 or 6 years have consistently advocated all the repressive measures that this House has been asked to consider. If you pass this rule and adopt this legislation the Bill of Rights is going right out of the window. If you do not believe me, read section 4 of the bill which if written into law abridges freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. Such action would be emphatically contrary to the purposes for which we are fighting in this war.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will vote down the rule so the consideration of this bill will not be necessary, and so that there will be no danger that industry will be demoralized by ill-considered action on the part of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON].

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to this rule and to the bill it makes in order.

It seems to me that our most important responsibility at this time is to win this tragic war and to bring peace to a war-torn world. You cannot do it if, in this chamber today, we adopt this rule and pass a bill to shackle labor when the responsibility of winning the war is largely in the hands of labor.

Labor has responded wholeheartedly to its responsibility, and what we are trying to do today is punish 11,500,000 patriotic, faithful, loyal union workers in order to punish a relatively small group and Mr. John L. Lewis. What kind of justice is this? How can it help win the war? What excuse can we offer to the millions of union workers who are responsible for the greatest production the world has ever known?

I have been advised by Mr. James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, that there has been produced 100,000 planes, and in the first month of this year 100 fighting ships, and in May alone 3 times as many pieces of artillery were produced for ground troops as in the 19 months of the preceding World War; 44,830,000 bombs have been manufactured. Air production in the year just ended are 60,000 planes as against 10,143 in the 12 months ending June 1, 1941. These figures represent but a fraction of the great production record.

Mr. Speaker, this is a magnificent record and we should be as proud of our soldiers on the assembly lines as we are of our soldiers in the field. Are we doing justice to them, or to the soldiers who are representing us all over this world, millions of whom have come from the ranks of labor, if we pass this bill today? We certainly are not. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely pray and hope that the House by its action today will not destroy the courage, the heart, and the soul of the working men and women of America. Let us vote down this iniquitous rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me pretty obvious that the same old labor-leader goon squads that have appeared here so frequently in the past have invaded the Capitol again. I want you to know that the main features of this bill are the same as the bill that passed this House in December 1941 by a vote of nearly two to one. There were only 136 votes against that bill, and of that 136 an even 50 were not reelected to this Seventy-eighth Congress. That is quite a heavy political casualty list.

We are told that labor has not been heard. The people of this Nation have been heard from; they have been heard from in a number of polls, two of them published in the last week. On the Connally bill, with respect to certain features of it which prohibited strikes, 78 percent of the public were in favor and 67 percent of labor were in favor of it. Why is the public so agitated; why does the public want to do something about this thing, notwithstanding the threats of William Green, which have been published in every paper of the United States, and which I will read to you in a moment? Why does the public want it? The reason why the public wants it is that, in spite of the no-strike pledges that were so much talked about, the public knows that strikes have been occurring. Have you any idea how many strikes and how much labor disturbance has been going on in this country? I might tell you. Do you know that with the exception of 2 years there were more strikes in 1942 than there had been in any year in the past 20 years? Do you know that there were more strikes in 1941 than there were in any other year, except the year that the National Labor Relations Act went into effect; more strikes in the middle of this war, in the face of a no-strike agreement, than in the last 20 years, with the exception of 2 years, and one of those was a war year? Do you know that the people of this Nation are getting impatient? Do you know how many strikes occurred in this Nation in the month of April? Three hundred and ninety-five! If that average is maintained throughout the year—and it looks like it will—there will be more strikes in this year, according to labor statistics, than have occurred since the beginning of the keeping of labor statistics by the Department of Labor, as shown by their own records in a statement just issued yesterday, which came to your desk.

Do you wonder that the people of this Nation want relief? Do you wonder they are impatient? Do you wonder that they do not want to accept any longer the full leadership of William Green?

Those are facts that have to be taken into consideration.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I am sorry. I do not have time to yield.

In General Motors alone, our greatest single producer of war materials, there have been 20 strikes in the last 4 months, an average of 1 strike every week. Do you know that the Timken Bearing Co. entered into a contract with a labor union on February 19 of this year, and since that time they have had 19 strikes in direct violation of their written contract?

Mr. Speaker, there is but one question to be decided in this, and that is whether under all those circumstances we are going to yield to the will of the American people merely the consideration of this legislation. You are not bound to vote for it or against it. All you are going to do today on this vote is say, "I will consider it," or "I refuse to consider it."

I have read you polls of what the American people say and what they want you to do. This is what Mr. William Green says:

> We will demand a record vote on this measure. Regardless of whether it is killed or adopted, we shall endeavor to vote out of office any Member of Congress who supports it. Into this effort the American Federation of Labor will pour every resource at its command.

That is the threat of William Green. Are you going to vote for William Green or are you going to vote for the American people this morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. LUCE], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the rule for the same reasons given by the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania. It is perfectly true, as our distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs says, that we have had many hearings, a thousand pages of them, on labor and manpower legislation, but it is equally true that none, or very little, of this testimony was pertinent to the bill under consideration today, S. 796, the Connally-Smith bill.

I voted to report out that bill. I made a mistake. I shall not hesitate ever, I hope, to say when I have made a mistake. And I do not feel that two wrong votes are ever going to make one right vote. For that reason, I am today opposed to the rule.

At the time the bill was reported out, as our distinguished chairman said, there had been no great pressure from the War Labor Board, the National Labor Relations Board, the Army or the Navy, or other interested departments to be heard before our committee on these two bills, the Smith-Connally bills, which they knew were pending. Had there been such pressure from them, I am sure we would have held off reporting the legislation to hear them. But the minute the bill was reported out, they did protest. And we did hear them. And I confess to having been greatly shaken by the unanimity of their disapproval of certain sections of this bill.

May I say in answer to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] that there is no way I know of, none at all, of being for the public and against the people at the same time. If, as I believe, this bill is, as it now stands, against the interests of millions of loyal working people, it will also in the end be against the public interest. I wish that our committee, which is very able to do so, had a little more time to bring out a piece of legislation which will not only satisfy the honest public desire to deal with the strike situation, but will protect the hard-won liberties and freedoms of patriotic working people everywhere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. NORMAN].

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe it is wise for the interests of the country or the Republican Party to vote for this rule under the present circumstances.

The Connally bill as passed by the Senate might possibly have been open to some debate, as to the advisability of its passage by the House, but after it has been amended in the House Committee by "hooking on" a lot of matters not in the least related to any so-called anti-strike legislation, I am going to vote against the rule. I do this because I do not believe that such legislation should be presented to the House without full and complete hearings in committee, which I understand was not done on some of the committee amendments to this bill.

For many years the Republican Party enjoyed the general support of labor, due to its policy of protection of the interests of labor. Of late years the trend of thought of labor has been persuaded to follow the New Deal rather than sound Republican principles. In my own district the Republicans put up most excellent candidates for the past 10 years without avail because labor generally supported the Democratic candidate. Last fall the Republican nominee had the confidence of labor, so there is now another Republican vote on our side of the House supporting JOE MARTIN and the Republican position on the tax bill and many other matters along that line. I sincerely hope that the Republican Party may not be maneuvered into a false position which may be interpreted as being unfriendly to labor in general.

Let us defeat this rule and at least give labor a fair hearing.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BALDWIN].

Mr. BALDWIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I can say in a very few words the reasons for my opposition to this rule. In the first place, it is my deep conviction that you cannot legislate cooperation. In the second place, I believe labor has cooperated largely in the war effort, and I think the record proves it. The best proof is the testimony of people from the Navy Department, the War Department, and the War Production Board.

In the third place, some of you may know that we, of the Committee on Labor, a few weeks ago held hearings for some time on absenteeism and other causes of labor unrest, if any. I can say categorically that, without exception, management, in their testimony, asked us not to pass legislation, because things were functioning all right.

Finally, this measure is not going to settle the coal strike for us, and you know it. I feel that if, in a moment of hysteria, in order to get one man who has proved to be, as far as I am concerned, both unpatriotic and unfriendly to labor, to wit, Mr. Lewis, we pass legislation of this type, we are doing a great injustice to the mass of labor, with whom I know most of us sympathize.

Certainly it is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that our production is, if anything, ahead of schedule. It is not a question of strikes. They have had strikes in England constantly, in fact more than we have, yet they are producing all right. It is not a question of this or that union. It is a question of whether we are delivering the goods and whether labor is helping to deliver the goods, and I maintain that it is.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this rule is defeated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this rule. Now let us see what has happened. The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill unanimously. It came before the Committee on Rules for a rule. I heard no extensive congressional opposition to the granting of the rule.

After that time, it is true, the letter from the Department heads was addressed to the committee. That letter was a little unusual, to say the least. I think the Committee on Military Affairs acted with complete propriety in sending for those people and saying to them, "We would like to hear what you have to say about this proposal." Personally, I have always thought that any witnesses desiring to testify before a congressional committee should be heard if possible.

In view of the fact that these additional hearings have been held just yesterday and this morning, it did seem to me that those in charge of determining when this matter might be called before the House might well have postponed its consideration for a few days. I personally urged such action, but that was not done.

And so, what is the situation here today? The issue is solely whether or not we are going to adopt this rule and say that we shall proceed with the consideration of the bill. Personally there are a few things in this bill that I do not think at the moment are desirable or necessary. There are some others that I think are desirable, and I think they should be enacted into law. They will be in the best interest of the country and in the best interest of the patriotic men and women in the ranks of labor. Be that as it may, if the rule is adopted, the bill will go on for consideration by the Committee of the Whole and amendments will be in order, and any needed corrections can be made.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. No; I do not have time. Then every Member has the right to vote either for or against the bill. If the Military Affairs Committee and the House leadership so determine, I take it that we might postpone further consideration of the matter for a few days. Of course, the Military Affairs Committee is primarily responsible for handling this legislation. They know what the situation is, and I think they ought to be the ones primarily to determine what might be done in that regard.

As for myself, I am unwilling to have it go to the country, the situation in the country being such as it is today, that the House of Representatives has refused to consider a matter that a great many people believe it necessary for us to consider, in view of those conditions prevailing in the country. That our people are disturbed about strikes which have occurred and are now occurring cannot be denied. They are demanding that we take some cognizance of them.

Some may suggest that the rule can be voted down, and perhaps a new bill subsequently brought in. I do not know whether that might happen or not. I do not know what the attitude of the committee might be. But if this rule is defeated today, I am convinced that it would go to the country that the House of Representatives had refused to consider this matter and to pass upon the merits or demerits of the legislation now before us. And there would be serious question whether subsequent action could be had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON] a member of the committee.

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, and members of the committee, I take this means to protest the fact that we had no adequate hearings on this bill. I do not think just because there is excitement running through the country, because of the unwarranted conduct of John L. Lewis, that we should pass unbalanced legislation. This bill affects 40,000,000 workers, and it has provisions in it that wipe out the policy of this Government as to labor for the past 10 years. There is a provision in the bill that wipes out the provisions of the LaGuardia Act, and things like that. There was not one single word of testimony on those vital provisions of this bill. When we got this bill from the Senate, it was completely amended by the House committee, and made entirely different from the Senate bill. We only had hearings after every single administrative officer in the Government protested certain provisions of the bill. I think it is better for us to take a few days in a matter like this that affects war development and war production and try to pass a piece of legislation that is well digested.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. No.

Mr. SHAFER. The gentleman voted to report out the bill, did he not?

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Yes, I admit I made a mistake and I am honest enough to say so. You cannot disregard the fact that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Maritime Commission, every single agency of the Government that has to do with production, states that this bill would retard instead of increase production. I want some legislation. I want to pass some legislation to satisfy my constituents who believe some reasonable legislation of this kind should be adopted, but I want that legislation well considered, and I want it constructive, something that I can go home and stand on. Up to the present time we have not had enough hearings on the bill, and that is why I shall vote against the rule.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the situation before us is not a happy one. Twenty days ago the Military Affairs Committee reports out this bill with a unanimous vote, and three Members of my own party come into the Well of the House today and disown that action and tell us that it was a mistake and that the rule should therefore be defeated. There ought to be a little more introspection and self-examination.

They have a perfect right to change their views. But they could clearly do so and still support this rule. Their views on the bill are probably not unlike my own. But the rule should be adopted and the bill modified to meet their views. That is the logical approach and does not put the Congress in the position of refusing to consider the matter at a time when the public mind is disturbed. Seventeen days ago the Rules Committee reported the rule. I do not know how the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] voted on this rule, but in the 17 intervening days there has been no effort made to indicate to myself, who is not a member of the Rules Committee and who is not a member of the Military Affairs Committee, that they were in error. The Rules Committee has a perfect right, individually and collectively, to change its views, but in the face of the differences of opinion manifest here it should have reconsidered before now. Today they come and ask us to vote down the rule. It is indeed an unhappy situation from the standpoint of the country as a whole. I am not for this bill unless it is substantially modified. I so stated publicly many days ago. I have a substitute resting in my brief case that I propose to offer, and it can be offered under the rule.

But what an absurdity it is to say to all of the people of the United States today that we refuse to even consider the bill, when it has had a unanimous report from the committee, and has been reported out for consideration by the Rules Committee, by a nearly unanimous vote. It is far more logical to vote up the rule to consider the bill, and then to either strike the enacting clause or substantialy modify the bill in the Committee of the Whole. Read the language of the rule. It provides that when it is adopted it shall be in order to consider S. 796. That is the language. You do not commit yourselves. You do not bind yourselves to vote one way or the other. You simply vote to consider, and it would be anomalous, indeed, to say to the country today that we refuse even to consider, after a unanimous vote by one committee and the report by the Rules Committee, which is the steering committee of this House. Let us vote up the rule and modify the bill or vote it down. A vote for the rule is not a vote for the bill. The rule is wholly and strictly a matter of procedure. The merits of the bill are not at issue.

There are many objectionable provisions in this bill. Unless modified, I shall not support the bill. But how can one vote against the rule and thereby say that he refuses to so much as consider the matter.

If and when the rule is adopted, the House resolves itself in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for broad debate. Thereafter the bill is read for amendment.

The rule is wide open. Any germane amendment can be offered. A motion can be made to strike the enacting clause. Amendments can be offered to delete any section of the bill. Substitute measures can be offered. Thereafter, the bill in such form as determined by the Committee of the Whole comes on for final action. Nobody is bound. Every Member is a free agent to vote as he pleases. But at a time like this, when the public mind is agitated, the elected Representatives should not refuse to consider this matter in an orderly and regular way. If the bill is ultimately defeated, we shall have the satisfaction, the people will have the satisfaction, and labor will have the satisfaction of knowing that the proposal was properly considered and that every affected interest has had its day in court on this floor.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Speaker, I certainly was edified by hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] when he took to task three members of his own party for their action in regard to this matter. I wonder if the gentleman from Illinois has forgotten the right-about turn that he made on the war measures when they were under discussion in 1941. As one Member of this House who took part in those debates and opposed every single measure that I thought was going to get us into this war, I stood on exactly the same platform that the gentleman from Illinois did, but I had the courage of my convictions and went back home and said so. The gentleman from Illinois took a right-about face and promptly marched down the hill again, in fear of what was going to happen the next election.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. His speech does not for 1 minute affect my vote either now or any other time. I believe in standing by my convictions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I deplore the existing conditions as much as any man, but I hope that within a few days or perhaps hours matters will be adjusted fairly and equitably.

My colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] criticizes his colleagues because they were courageous enough to admit that they have made a mistake when they voted to report the bill out of committee. I will say to him that instead of being criticized they should be commended on their admission that they have been imposed upon in voting for this bill which is a vicious substitute for the Connally bill. For the information of my colleague there were many other Members who had no opportunity to explain that they were misled in voting for this monstrosity of a bill which embodies all the vicious Smith provisions that certain antilabor gentlemen have tried to force through this House in the last 3 years.

Mr. Speaker, right here I wish to say that the Committee on Military Affairs, which emasculated the Connally bill, and that without a hearing, has usurped the legislative jurisdiction of other committees. Its membership has yielded to my friend, the chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, who, like the gentleman from Virginia and others, are unfortunately extremely prejudiced against organized labor. I regret that these antilabor groups and members have been able to force a rule out of the Committee on Rules over my protest, notwithstanding the fact, as has been stated here and before the Committee on Rules, that hearings had not been held by the Committee on Military Affairs despite the urgent appeals of the heads of all the labor organizations that they be given an opportunity to be heard. They were denied a hearing on the theory or the lame assumption that previous hearings had been held, but the antilabor members failed to state that hearings were held, not during the present Congress, but in the last Congress.

Mr. Speaker, if this legislation was not so far-reaching, I could overlook the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that he gave these labor leaders a hearing yesterday. It is strange, indeed, that this hearing was accorded weeks after the bill was reported by his committee, and after the rule for its consideration had been forced out of the Committee on Rules. Does he not think that it was rather late to grant such a hearing? Oh, yes; he states that they will amend the bill after hearing from these labor leaders. I say to him that no number of amendments that might be adopted on the floor will eliminate the unfair restrictions against labor. They will deprive a man of his right to voice his opinion and will violate his privileges under the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

Mr. Speaker, personally I concede that the labor leaders of this country are against this legislation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] and, I presume, the gentleman from Mississippi, will likewise stress that labor is opposed to the legislation, but I wish to point out that leaders in industry as well as high officials of the Government, including Secretary of War Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Knox, Admiral Land of the Maritime Commission, and many others are also opposed to this legislation. The proponents of this bill and the enemies of labor seek at all times to place the blame for strikes and stoppages of work at the doorstep of labor, but it happens at the moment in the serious mine labor situation that the miners have agreed to compromise while the mine owners, for whom we have done so much and aided to a greater extent than ever before, refuse to accede to the offer of compromise. They apparently fail to recognize that the tremendous increase in the cost of living justifies a reasonable increase in the wages of men engaged in the most hazardous of all occupations. Favorable action on the resolution for a rule or on the bill will be a feather in the hat of John L. Lewis, who selfishly, it appears to me, would weaken the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and other labor organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the Committee on Labor and the Committee on the Judiciary having jurisdiction, and unlike the Committee on Military Affairs, are holding hearings on needed labor legislation. The proposed legislation, instead of being destructive or oppressive to labor or industry, will be helpful and beneficial to them as well as to the Government, and I can assure the House that when the bills are reported out the Committee on Rules will grant a rule for their consideration without delay.

The gentleman from Virginia gave some figures relating to the number of strikes. He did not say that some of the strikes were of only a half hour or an hour or a day or 2 in duration.

I most respectfully ask him to take notice of the fact that all these strikes amounted to a net loss in man-hours of only three-tenths of 1 percent monthly. I repeat, the loss amounted to only that much—only three-tenths of 1 percent in man-hours per month, and notwithstanding this, he continues to stress the undue number of strikes and to magnify the number of hours lost by reason of strikes and stoppages of work—anything to create prejudice against labor that has kept its word and its pledge to eliminate strikes and to cooperate 100 percent with the Government; and this labor has done, despite the statement of the gentleman from Virginia.

In this connection, I also wish to insert, for the information of the House, a telegram which I received only this morning from Mr. Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, which also really expresses the sentiments of all organized labor in the United States, which have a right to petition, and rights to appeal, to speak in behalf of 10 or 11 million wage workers, unlike some unfair, avaricious and unwise industrialists and publicists who keep the Washington hotels and the Capitol overcrowded with their lobbyists and agents. Mr. Green's telegram reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 1, 1943.

Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

It seems inconceivable that Congress would consider and act upon vicious antilabor legislation such as the Connally-May bill, S. 796, without giving labor a chance to be heard in opposition to said measure. My appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to grant labor a hearing in opposition to the bill was denied. I appeal to the Members of the House to defeat the rule providing for consideration of the Connally-May antilabor bill in order that it may be returned to the Committee on Military Affairs for further consideration and to accord the representatives of the American Federation of Labor an opportunity to present facts and arguments in opposition to said antilabor legislation.

WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the three ladies, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. LUCE], and the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON], who so splendidly appealed to the Members to vote against this atrocious Smith destructive conglomeration of antilabor provisions as contained in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I feel that this is not the time to pass this legislation, because it would do a great deal more harm than the advocates think it may do good.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, rarely has Congress selected a more propitious time to consider a particular matter of legislation than is the case of our consideration of the antistrike bill today. True, some of us may act hot-headedly under the existing circumstances, but, on the other hand, perchance there may be some who need the stimulus of such a national threat to realize the danger and to stir sufficient courage to do that which must be done if democracy is to survive.

Government by law in this great Nation is challenged and is dangerously near a break-down. Within the body politic, under governmental sanction and without Government control, we have permitted political organizations, under the name of organized labor, to grow to such proportions that they now threaten the sovereignty of the Government itself. The dramatic example of the moment is that of John L. Lewis, dictator of the Mine Workers' Union, who has placed his imperious will above the law and above the interest of his country at war.

The President of the United States has solemnly appealed to the mine workers to go back to the mines and mine coal as their patriotic duty under the stars and stripes. John L. Lewis tells them not to work. The mine workers have chosen to follow, not the President, not the Commander in Chief in time of war, but instead the dictator of the miners' union. Why do you suppose they chose to follow Lewis' leadership rather than to follow the President of the United States and the undoubted promptings of their own patriotic impulses? The answer is not far to find. John L. Lewis holds the power of economic life or death over them. Many of these people know no trade but mining. Upon that they must depend for their livelihood. If John L. Lewis blackballs a miner there is no appeal from his decision. No miner can work in a union mine without Lewis' permission. This is the reason that the miners are creatures subject to the nod and whim of Lewis' wishes as if they were lieges of a feudal lord. And the Government itself, shame upon all who are responsible for it, delivered the miners into this economic bondage by forcing all nonunion miners to join Lewis' union. Now, the livelihood of all the United Mine Workers is in the hand of Lewis, who owes no responsibility to anyone for his satrapy, and, indeed, contemptuously defies the Government of the United States. The Government must not only break this strike, but it must break the toils of Lewis' tyranny over 500,000 of our fellow Americans.

For 2 years now I have waged a fight against inflation, which is a hazard to the Nation second only to the threat of Hitler and Japan. I have done my utmost to fight this internal foe. We know that more great nations have fallen from within than from the force of external military foes.

Belatedly though it was, the President has ordered that the line be held against wage and salary increases and against run-away prices.

The farmers of the United States have patriotically accepted restraints feeling that in doing so they were making a proper sacrifice and contribution to the stability of our economy which must endure if we are to win the war and the peace.

John L. Lewis, and others, too, are attempting to break the line against wage increases. Lewis is disregarding all orders, all measures, and all procedures set up for the purpose of handling disputes. He is contemptuous of the Nation's leadership. Indeed, he is attempting to take the measure of the President of this great Republic. By our action on this bill, Lewis and every other home-grown dictator must be made amenable to the law. And the law must be enforced. Otherwise he will continue to regard himself above the law, thus degenerating democracy to mobocracy.

I want to warn the President that if he succumbs to the threat of this unpatriotic onslaught against his leadership and against the sovereignty of the people's government; that if John L. Lewis' demands are granted, he can count me out on restrictions on farm commodities, or on the little businessmen of the country. Of course, I well know that if all restraints are removed the devil will be to pay, but he'll be to pay anyway if the Government isn't big enough to handle a mad egotist like Lewis; so, if that be the case, we'll all just take the ride together, as far as I am concerned. A partial holding of the line is not only unworkable but unfair. It should be held everywhere, and cannot be held anywhere unless it is held everywhere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY].

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the rule for two reasons. The first is that full and sufficient hearings were not given on this particular measure. The second is that the Committee on Military Affairs should not have jurisdiction over this kind of legislation. If the Committee on Military Affairs had conducted proper hearings, with industry and labor invited to testify, and if they had considered the facts, this sort of legislation would never have been brought out. I approach this problem as a practical businessman and I know how industry feels about this sort of legislation. I know how labor feels about it.

Mr. SABATH. How does industry feel?

Mr. KELLEY. It is against it.

The laboring people of this Nation are making inestimable sacrifices. Their wages have been frozen, and in many instances they have been frozen on the job, thus preventing any opportunity to better their conditions.

Besides this, the rationing in many areas has prevented families from getting sufficient food, and the workers of the families in heavy industries, such as steel workers and miners, have been denied sufficient food to sustain their strength for their arduous work.

In addition, they have suffered with the rest of the people the taxes and rising cost of living.

To top this off, almost every laboring family has sons in the services. Further, it is estimated that among certain union groups the percentage of members in the armed forces is as high as 18 percent. Several are as high as 16 percent. This is far above the national average.

It is regrettable that Members of Congress and many newspapers overlook this fact and do not pay enough tribute to those who have out-produced any nation in the world in war materials.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, strikes in defense industries in time of war are strikes against the Government, and should not be permitted.

The truth of this statement was recognized by the labor leaders when they agreed with the President of the United States that there should be no strikes during the war, and the War Labor Board was set up so that all parties aggrieved could submit their differences to this Board for arbitration, and the understanding was that work should continue while the differences were being arbitrated by this Board.

Unfortunately, we have had many strikes since the war began in many different industries, and today the coal mines of the United States are closed, notwithstanding the fact that coal is an essential commodity upon which all of our war industries depend, and John L. Lewis, the head of the union miners, refuses to appear before the Board to consider or discuss the question of the demands of the miners, which has now caused a strike and the closing of the mines.

This is defiance of law and a contempt for the constituted authorities of the Government.

Appeals have been made by the President of the United States, but such appeals have gone unheeded, and all of the coal mines are closed today, due to a strike of the miners, which is crippling to the war effort and which, if continued, will paralyze the industries that are producing the guns, munitions, tanks, and planes which our boys must have with which to whip the enemy.

With such a situation as this confronting us, Congress cannot refuse to consider legislation to prevent such stoppages, and I am glad that this bill has been brought before the House, so that we can now consider legislation designed to prevent strikes in defense industries in time of war.

It has been definitely determined that the President is powerless to prevent strikes in war industries, and it is now up to Congress to do so. The American people are looking to Congress, as they have a right to do, to pass proper legislation dealing with such a situation, and if Congress fails to consider such legislation, it would be a neglect of duty in time of war, the consequences of which may be disastrous in the winning of the war.

It is unthinkable that the House of Representatives will fail to meet the responsibility which devolves upon it today, and the defeat of the rule to consider this bill, in my judgment, would cause Congress to sink to a new low in the eyes of the American people.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the rule and also the so-called Connally-Smith bill which it makes in order because I believe it proposes a remedy that is more dangerous than the disease it is intended to cure.

When I think of the comparatively small group involved, in comparison with all labor employed on war work, it seems about as logical for Congress to pass this bill as for a surgeon to cut off a man's head to save his finger.

I know that a great many people are fighting mad at labor unions, some for personal reasons, others whose emotions have been whipped up by the press and the radio.

I think myself that if labor is to preserve the right to strike in peacetime, which is its only effective weapon against organized employers, it might be wise for all labor to adopt, as almost all labor has adopted, the policy of no strikes in wartime.

The fact that a small group headed by a hate-poisoned, power-drunk leader have struck and are temporarily paralizing a vital war industry does not warrant Congress in penalizing all labor.

Now, of course, with a coal strike on today, it is both easy and popular to pillory labor. In fact, we have a situation just made to order for labor baiters and labor haters. The coal strike makes it tough for men who support labor on principle and who are convinced that while the present situation is bad it still does not warrant penalizing all labor. In fact, to do so would be the equivalent of hanging all men named Jones because a man named Jones committed murder.

It certainly was not striking labor that produced 100,000 airplanes; it certainly is not striking labor that produced such a volume of machine guns that one-sixth of our armed forces could be armed with them; it certainly was not striking labor that produced the tanks in 5 weeks that licked Rommel at El Alamein; it certainly is not striking labor that is building more ships than the Axis Powers can sink, though they started the war with more subs, guns, tanks, planes, and ships than we had.

It is easy to smear labor. Being a human institution, it has faults, yes, grievous faults, but still very human faults. It is easy to stand up here on the floor and charge everything; but labor, with all its faults, has performed a miracle on the production line.

It is the over-all results that count, and labor has done a magnificent, aye, a marvelous, over-all job of production.

I might offer an invidious comparison, but since comparisons are odious I will not.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I favor the defeat of the Connally-Smith bill, and will take advantage of the first opportunity to kill it by voting against the rule now under consideration. I favor cutting it off sharply, right behind the ears, without wasting any time. There are no arguments in favor that are valid or appealing to me. There are many arguments against the rule and the bill. The Norris-LaGuardia law and the National Labor Relations Act and all of the labor gains of the past 10 years, and even more would be jeopardized if not nullified should the bill pass. I take no chances upon the rule and shall vote against it at this, the first opportunity. There can be no doubt as to my sentiments. I refuse to be swayed by the wave of hysteria which has been heightened by the coal strike which is now in progress and is so disappointing to all of us. This bill will harm, not help the situation. The opponents of labor, not its friends, are taking advantage of a psychological time to force through a bill which would place all of labor in a strait jacket.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply provides that the House shall give consideration to a bill that has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Military Affairs, as well as the Committee on Rules. I am not satisfied with all of the provisions of the bill to be considered under this rule but I do think the House should show courage and willingness in permitting the legislation to come to the floor and be subjected to debate and amendments. If it were a closed rule that did not permit sufficient time for debate and did not allow the offering of amendments, I would not support it but I do think the legislation is of sufficient importance to the House and to the country that it should be given full and complete discussion. Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of any law or any measure that, in my judgment, will in any way injure organized labor or its right to organize and bargain. Labor, generally speaking, has done a magnificent job in the war effort. It has made a record that is not excelled anywhere in the world. The rank and file of labor are among our most patriotic citizens. They want to do the right thing, and they want to do their part to see that this war is brought to a successful conclusion just as soon as it can possibly be done. It is almost impossible to appreciate the responsibility labor has assumed in the war effort. I do think that, if it is found necessary by this Congress to do so, legislation should be passed to see that the fair and reasonable rights of labor, generally, are properly guarded and protected. I hope and believe this House will give fair consideration to all sides of the problem involved when the pending measure comes up for debate and final decision.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCANLON.]

Mr. SCANLON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a minute if the gentleman from New York will permit me, to say as chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor, that during the last 3 weeks we have been conducting hearing on H. R. 1483, introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, Congressman LANDIS, a bill to require the furnishing of certain information by labor organizations and to prohibit political contributions by labor organizations, and on H. R. 804, introduced by the gentleman from Michigan, Congressman WOODRUFF, a bill prohibiting aliens from holding office in labor organizations or voting at the elections of labor organizations, we have never been able to get one person from management to appear before our subcommittee and tell us why such legislation as this is needed at this time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this rule. I regret that we suffer from such an exiguity of time in which to advance arguments against the pending drastic antilabor bill, S. 796.

In this connection, I quote William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor:

> The victims of this legislation, if it is finally passed, will be the membership of the American Federation of Labor, who in response to a request made by the President of the United States relinquished the exercise of the right to strike for the duration of the war. The record shows that the 6,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor have made a 98 percent record in keeping this no-strike pledge. These are the workers who, immediately after Pearl Harbor, erected barracks for our soldiers, manufacturing plants, buildings at our flying fields, all in record-breaking time. They are the workers who produced 6,200 planes last month, and are turning out ships, tanks, guns, and ammunition in an amazing way. They have reached new heights and established new records in production. They are the best, most skilled and efficient workers in the world.
> The Connally antistrike bill strikes at a very fundamental right of working men and women. When through the enactment of legislation you deprive workers of the right to strike, you impose upon them a condition of involuntary servitude which is contrary to our American way of life, and to our democratic principles and processes. There is a vast difference between the voluntary relinquishment of the right to strike and the substitution of force and compulsion against workers, robbing them of the right to strike and reducing them to a condition of involuntary servitude. The 6,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor voluntarily laid aside the strike weapon for the duration of the war, but they will oppose with all the power at their command any attempt to compel them to do so. It is no answer to say that the right to strike is taken away only in industries which have been taken over by the Government. This amounts to a difference in degree only, and not in substance.

Recently a newspaper editorial trenchantly summed up the situation which I think worthy of reading to you at this point:

[From the Washington Post of May 13, 1943]

CURBING STRIKES

> The House Military Affairs Committee has warped the Senate's Connally bill into a pair of handcuffs for labor. What was intended originally as legislation to strengthen the President's powers in dealing with strike problems has now become a purely punitive and repressive measure. This is the reaction of angry men to the situation created by John L. Lewis in the coal industry. But ire is scarcely a sound stimulus to lawmaking. When the House comes to consider this proposal, it will do well to bear in mind the admonition which Senator BARKLEY delivered to his colleagues during discussion of the Connally bill last week: "Do not legislate in anger because you are mad at somebody."
> The provisions of the old Smith antistrike bill which the House Military Affairs Committee grafted onto the Connally measure and which we criticized 12 months ago can serve only as an irritant to the already difficult labor problems with which the country is beset. They will be regarded by organized labor, and rightly, as class legislation, designed to impose upon them special restrictions. Such legislation can be nothing but a provocation to unrest and disunity. Men won't work when they are shackled.

All organized labor groups in America fulminate at this measure. Our Commander in Chief, the War Department, the Maritime Commission, the Navy Department, the War Production Board, the War Labor Board, and the National Labor Relations Board join in vigorously denouncing the instant bill.

We cannot legislate morale. We cannot insure production at the point of a bayonet in a free democracy. We are asked here and now to turn back the clock of progress. I will not be a party to retrogression. I urge my colleagues to vote "No" on the rule.

Because so much has been said in condemnation of coal miners, I ask your indulgence while I briefly discuss some little-comprehended facts anent that great assemblage of war workers.

A PLEA FOR JUSTICE FOR COAL MINERS

Mr. Speaker, the most maligned and misunderstood group of skilled trade unionists in the United States is that comprising the coal miners. Today these miners are asking for belated justice, for overdue recognition of the need for wage adjustments in the coal industry.

The coal miner is perhaps the most skilled artisan in America. He must be a chemist, a powder man, a carpenter, a civil engineer, a structural engineer, possess a superb physique, all in one. It is the industry which has the highest mortality rate of any in this country. Coal miners are more exploited, in many of the coal-mining towns, than are any other comparable group. They are ill-fed and undernourished, below the standard of their neighbors. In many eastern coal-mining communities they are compelled to live in virtual hovels and are denied the atmosphere of cleanliness which is their God-given right.

Last year they produced 640,000,000 tons of anthracite and bituminous coal. This year they will produce in excess of 700,000,000 tons of these combined products. Yet, there are 160,000 fewer men employed in the coal mines now than when the previous coal production record was established.

In 1941, 64,764 mine workers were killed and injured, a casualty record of 1 out of 10. When the 1942 casualty roll has been completed statistically it will be found that 75,000 men have been killed and injured. The coal miner's job is laborious and extremely hazardous.

Mine workers live remote from the cities. They work all day in the dark, breathing impure air flushed into them by power fans. They must strip down to a pair of shorts and shoes and socks. Their bodies are saturated with perspiration. They are subject to constant abrasions from falling rock and pieces of coal. Their skin is often a mass of painful cuts and bruises into which coal dust filters, adding to their agony. Few of the mine properties possess washrooms where the men may scour and clean their bodies following their daily shift. Frequently it requires as much as 45 minutes of vigorous scrubbing to get the body reasonably clean. Often the men are required to ride from 10 to 20 miles to their homes before they can wash, while overheated from perspiration and while filthy with coal dust.

There is no Member here who would be ambitious to train his son to become a coal miner. Yet the coal miner performs a special service to the community and to the Nation. Without his activity, industry would falter.

In the metals mines of the United States, the miners are given compensation on the basis of portal to portal. In the coal mines of Canada and Great Britain the miners are likewise paid on the same basis. The British miners' workday starts when they enter the mine and ceases when they emerge.

The mine worker must eat and he must eat strong meat. Strong food is essential to his efficient functioning. Without ample proteins, the miner's bodily strength disappears, his resistance is lowered, and he becomes a victim of the ills that are the sequels of malnutrition.

The coal miner is subject to the attack of some six or seven different kinds of poisonous gas, only one of which is detectable by the sense of smell. Often he works in muck and water up to his knees, sometimes up to his waistline. He works under the strain of knowing that at any moment his way out may be cut off, that the roof may cave in, that he may be asphyxiated.

Yet the coal miners have purchased more War bonds in proportion to their number and have furnished more members and sons of members to the armed services on a per capita percentage than any other labor group in our country.

The Little Steel formula has denied justice to the workers of the country. It has failed to retard the upward spiral of wholesale or retail prices. The cost of living to the coal miner has pyramided astronomically.

The following table shows the comparison of average increase for the high and low averages in prices of foodstuffs as between August 1939 and February 1943. These figures speak for themselves. It must be remembered that a coal miner's expenditures are almost entirely consumed in outlays for food and plain and common consumer necessities:

Medium average

Beef	100.8
Pork cuts	132.2
Butter and eggs	147.8
Fish	119.5
Canned goods	104.2
Irish potatoes	159.2
Dry peas and beans	124.4
Fresh fruit and vegetables	110.6
Dried fruit	113.8
Lard and shortening	144.9
Chicken	119.0
Lamb	119.4

The figure for fresh fruits and vegetables, 110.6, is for January 1941–February 1943.

The Congress has denied to the President the legal power to limit net annual incomes to a maximum of $25,000 per year. The Congress has voted into law a quasi-Ruml plan, favorable to the rich. Congress has shown solicitude repeatedly for those of heavy incomes. Let us give some regard to the requirements of coal miners.

The labor members of the War Labor Board unanimously supported the stand of the coal miners in their wage-adjustment request. Remember that the coal miner, after years of devoted work, receives less pay than shipyard and aircraft workers. In my State the coal operators are willing to recognize the coal miners' wage request as reasonable, but are denied the opportunity to grant the request unless and until the eastern coal operators grant such increases.

No one has yet suggested freezing of profits in industry, nor has any statutory limit been placed thereon. The agitation of the mine workers has gotten results from the O. P. A. to the extent that it has embarked on a roll-back in prices which will help to stabilize and slow up increases in the price of living.

Recently two colleagues, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROWE], paid eloquent tribute in this House to the patriotic services being rendered to the country by the coal miners. The miner is asking for simple and elementary justice, and his prayer should be heeded.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the rule and to this Connally antistrike bill which will come before the House if the rule is adopted.

When this bill was before our committee we did not have the testimony of the War and Navy Departments, the Maritime Commission, or the War Labor Board. Since that time the representatives of these various branches of our Government, branches which are charged particularly with the all-important task of winning the war, have given us their opinions, belatedly, it is true, but nonetheless weighty and compelling insofar as they affect my present decision to vote.

The representatives of each of these departments have now unalterably expressed their opposition to this bill as an actual deterrent to the war effort. Surely they who are charged, as I said before, with the task of seeing this war to a successful conclusion should know what is best for the war effort. In addition, the Honorable James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization, has given to the public the staggering accomplishments that have been achieved by the cooperation and patriotic effort of labor. Production records are exceeding the greatest hopes of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, the assembly line is as important in this war as the far-flung battle line, and the soldiers of production who are supplying the soldiers on the front with the materials of war should not be harassed by antilabor legislation. There is no evidence that has been submitted to this House which shows that the stream of supplies to our troops has not been flowing in adequate amount.

This is no time to arouse disunity and discontent among the millions of patriotic workers of our country.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BREHM].

Mr. BREHM. Mr. Speaker, before a physician can successfully prescribe, he must first diagnose, if he is to cure the ills of his patient. Before Congress can successfully legislate, it should first diagnose, if it is to materially aid in curing some of the Nation's ills.

If it is unethical for a physician to prescribe the identical medicine for each patient who has a headache without first ascertaining the cause of the pain, then it seems to me that it is just a little unethical for Congress to enact drastic legislation which will brand all labor with the same iron.

The physician encounters radicals, hypochondriacs, and insane among his patients. He treats them in accordance with prescribed methods for their various ills. Just because one of them happens to be mentally ill, he does not consign all of his patients to a psychopathic ward.

Neither do I feel that Congress should consign all members of labor to condemnation just because some radical leader, suffering from delusions of grandeur, should fly off on a tangent. I believe that the guilty should be punished, but I am not in favor of mass execution just to reach the few.

If the Army discovers that it has an inefficient general, it replaces him with a competent commander and does not purge the entire regiment for following the leader into defeat. I honestly believe that if labor had the same laws governing it as industry has, there would be no trouble.

A fellow named Adam once had a beautiful estate, but he also had an ambition to see beyond the boundaries of his estate, so he ate an apple and took a look for himself. Adam's ambition put the entire human race behind the eight ball for the time being, but you all know the verdict which was finally rendered. An all-wise judge cast Adam out of his estate and eventually sacrificed His only Son to help us out of the situation in which Adam had placed us.

It seems to me that there is more than one Adam responsible in this case, who, while not trying to corner the apple market, have certainly been trying to corner the market of power.

I am heartily in favor of casting these Adams out of the estate and honestly believe that just as the workers in a colony of bees drive out the drones, so will these Adams be driven out by the colony, providing that we do not destroy the workers in the colony.

Ambition unrestrained is sometimes a dangerous attribute. Each and every Member of Congress is ambitious to do something concerning an unjustifiable situation. The question is not so much that we do something, but that we do the right something.

I remember reading in high school the admonition given to Cromwell by Cardinal Wolsey in Shakespeare's Henry VIII. He said to him:

> Cromwell, I charge thee, fling away ambition: by that sin fell the angels; how can man, then, the image of his Maker, hope to win by it?

History is filled with men, from the time of Adam down to the present, whose ambitions have been their downfall. No doubt many of you feel that history should now repeat itself and cause the downfall of an ambitious individual.

Perhaps you are right, but I trust that your ambition to overthrow an ambitious individual will not be the means of overthrowing thousands of individuals whose sole ambition is to produce the munitions for winning the war, while at the same time to enjoy the necessities of life with very few of its luxuries.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, no matter what any man may say, it is apparent to me that this legislation now pending before the House is antilabor legislation. It is so understood by labor as a whole—by the public stung into resentment by an incident of recalcitrance carried beyond all bounds of reason—and I make bold to say it is so understood by a great many Members of the Congress who are now giving it their support. It seems to me, aside and apart from all consideration of the numerical strength of those who eat their bread in the sweat of their brows, that the rights of labor as an essential and inseparable part of this country, its prosperity, and its happiness, are such that this great factor in our common life should not be hastily indicted before the bar of a legislative body well described as "the greatest deliberative body in the world."

I believe it was Pitt who declared that you cannot indict a whole nation, and it remains true today that he who rouses up the machinery of government to degrade and outlaw any class of the citizenry, whether on the score of intolerance in matters of race or creed, or economic or political distinction—tosses a firebrand of bigotry into our national affairs that may well prove the forerunner of destruction of our American institutions with consequent disaster to us all.

Mr. Speaker, rather than being forced into the position of a culprit and public enemy at this time, labor is richly entitled to the praise and confidence of the Nation at large. It required no compulsory or other legislation to call forth from the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. in the shattering dawn after Pearl Harbor the pledge that there would be no strike called by labor during the present war.

These bodies knew that the right to strike was as inherent as the right to defend against involuntary servitude. But they also knew that under stress of common peril all rights might and should be waived. No one in this House, I take it, will rise up to say that this pledge has not been substantially and faithfully kept. Not only has labor kept on the job but by constant and Herculean effort it has increased its efficiency and the output to figures hitherto undreamed of.

The labor movement in this country, uniting its membership in a common cause seeking higher standards of living and a collective activity productive of fair, stable, and dependable bases of working, living, and conditions of work, is perhaps the largest aspect of social progress under a democracy to be found anywhere on earth. It was this movement that cut down working hours from those of the serf chained to his toil, to those of a free man having not alone a daily pittance but a place in the very sun of existence. It was organized labor that finally demonstrated that human labor is not a commodity to be bought, sold, and cast off in the open market at whatever terms that might be dictated by competition and managerial inefficiency, or by the greed of employers fattening in times of depression on the necessities of the poor.

Mr. Speaker, practically all the advances in the condition of labor, bringing a larger economic output, an increased standard of public health, education, and usefulness, bringing to the worker a larger purchasing power immediately reflected in a greater demand for consumable goods, have been accomplished by the labor movement, without the help of legislation, and often in the face of a public opinion poisoned at the wellsprings by clever and unscrupulous demagogs who found it to their advantage to ally themselves with those who had money for such purposes.

It is only in recent years that legislation has gradually passed through the Congress giving effect to the rule that employments of all sorts are affected by a public interest and should be supervised in the light of the public conscience. This legislation enunciating newly the old functions of Government to enact legislation to promote the general welfare has been of great service to labor and the people at large. But at most it merely recognized rights that had always existed and it provided administrative agencies for the purpose of arriving at terms that should be recognized as fair, just, legal, voluntary, and capable of enforcement above and beyond the power of the unions that had so far maintained them. Great advances had been made through collective bargaining. Contracts had become firm contracts binding both parties alike and not merely truces to be violated when the convenient opportunity arose.

Mr. Speaker, the compact between labor and the Government was not one founded on any legislation. It was the spontaneous, patriotic expression of the attachment of a large fraction of our people for our liberties. Likewise in the administration of the pledge by the aid of the War Labor Board there was no binding legislation. The President preferred to keep the relation one that was voluntary in its inception and one that was voluntary in its approach to the means that were expected to remove even the occasion for strikes. The voluntary, extralegislative character of the compact between labor and the Government must not be overlooked. When labor pledged cooperation, the Government pledged that it would refrain from compulsion by law. To pass a compulsory law now in a fit of anger and to cover up its own failure to do its part by controlling the cost of living would now be a glaring example of want of good faith on the part of the Government.

It may be conceded that the task of the War Labor Board and of the unions was not a simple one. Other agencies of Government, some armed by legislation with more potent capacities, bent their influences on the problems of the workers. The military demands and the manpower demands were calculated to disrupt the permanency and continuity of labor. Food and fuel shortages with accompanying rises in prices, pressed heavily on labor.

Mr. Speaker, the thing that has brought down condemnation on the head of labor and that has provoked the hasty drafting of this pending legislation as a punitive measure has been the ambitious, domineering, and rule-or-ruin policy of John L. Lewis. Under the no-strike pledge and the waiver of legislation, the highest degree of good faith required him as a deposed leader of the C. I. O. and as an active head of the mine workers, whom he has for long swayed as a feudal baron would sway his feudal retainers, to give full effect to those pledges and to submit his grievances to that tribunal set up not by law but as an evidence of good faith. Mr. Lewis has balked and the mine properties are now in the physical custody of the United States Government. Mr. Lewis refused to continue collective negotiations through the War Labor Board on a pretext too transparent to be seriously argued. It is this situation that has brought about a demand to substitute the existing gentleman's agreements by the passage of general legislation indicting and regimenting all war labor as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I do not say that the miners have no just complaint. The $1 raise they received in 1941 was shortly more than offset by an increase in living costs of about 22 percent, and the cost of food is 40 percent of the living costs of miners.

They have long and laborious work, calling for all their strength, and yet they do not get enough to eat. A man who formerly had and needed three pork chops with his lunch every day now has none. He goes home and finds no meat in the house. At the company store, where formerly 1,200 pounds of meat were available for purchase weekly, now no more than 70 to 80 pounds are to be had. These are serious conditions, and they cry out for a remedy, but I am convinced the remedy is to be found through the War Labor Board and the Office of Price Administration. We cannot at this time desert the orderly avenues of presentation and appeal. Mr. Lewis stated he would not bargain further because his case was prejudged.

Mr. Speaker, I hold no brief for the War Labor Board or the Office of Economic Stabilization. These agencies, operating under Executive directives, have been attempting to reduce to a formula the limitations of relief they will administer generally under all conditions that may arise. While adhering strictly in most cases to the formula for increases in wages, they and other agencies of Government have proved woefully ineffective and inept in the domain of prices of those commodities that make up the cost of living. They are even faced with a shortage of food in the open market. It is a matter of elementary mathematics that when a ratio is ordained between two factors, one at least of the factors must remain constant or the ratio will become meaningless.

If we determine that a man is entitled to three meals a day, we cannot stultify ourselves by later requiring that one of the meals shall consist of bread and water.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the War Labor Board, even in the case of the mine workers, is gradually evolving an application of its formulas and its relief powers that will solve the conflict while at the same time preserving the "face" of both sides.

It is a terrible thing, Mr. Speaker, for any country to be ridden by a formula. We have fought wars for formulas.

Mr. Speaker, there are many who will say this is not a punitive measure but the orderly genesis of pertinent legislation. I cannot agree with them. At another time and after a cooling time some of the present legislation may be worthy of reexamination, but today with its slant in the direction of removing some established rights, such as given by the Norris-LaGuardia act and others, the legislation has capacities for mischief and injustice far beyond any remedial merits it may contain.

Mr. Speaker, the tendency manifested by the pending legislation is to make labor in general the scapegoat for certain ills and maladjustments in the economics of a nation at war. Certain effects are considered by the authors of this legislation and immediately it occurs to them to associate these effects with the first causes that come to their mind. It seems to me that this legislation is as far from the point as is the alleged Chinese custom of burning down a house to roast a pig merely because the art of pig-roasting originally was discovered after a conflagration.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the purpose to injure labor in its good name and in the enjoyment of hard-won rights is too evident in this legislation to be set down as inadvertent.

When the criminal procedure is resorted to with fines and imprisonments, supplemented by provision for the issuance of Federal injunctions under odious conditions that we had thought were forever abolished, it seems to me that this legislation is neither just nor wise. It appeals not to our sober sense but to strife and passion, denunciation, and recrimination. It is well calculated to alienate labor and to set one class at the throat of another to the great detriment of our war effort.

That I am not alone in these views is apparent from the protests that have already been made against this legislation. The War Department, the Navy Department, the Labor Department, the War Production Board, the Maritime Commission, the War Labor Board, and the National Labor Relations Board, are among the agencies that have protested against the enactment of this type of legislation at this time. These are agencies that must meet and work with and look to labor in their daily tasks. Their burdens are great enough without adding those that will result from the enactment of legislation deliberately planned to provoke a disturbance of the economic and public peace.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, you cannot indict the whole body of labor in this way. If this business of indicting and pillorying diverse classes of the population is to begin in this instance, I ask you solemnly when and where it will end.

Let us fight the enemy but not among ourselves.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1¾ minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Speaker, I think the time has arrived when we should calm ourselves and not accept everything as being 100 percent accurate that is said here in this Well.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] finds fault with those who have changed their opinion and who were intellectually honest enough with the Members of this House to admit that they made a mistake when they voted to report this bill out. These Members admit that no opportunity was given to the laboring people to express their opinion on this legislation. I want to congratulate those Members for having had the courage to change their opinion.

The time has arrived when we should stop insulting 80 percent of the people of this Nation by accusing them of being unpatriotic. Such action itself is un-American. This bill itself is un-American. If it had not been for the laboring people who still have the courage to protest, we would have but very little liberty left.

I only wish that the small businessmen and the farmer would have as much courage to protect their liberty as the labor organizations have. I repeat that the time has come when we should have sufficient intelligence, sufficient honesty and integrity to know that all our people are patriotic, that they are all doing their share to win this war.

On a number of occasions this House has invited foreign representatives to address us, but so far has not invited the small businessmen, the farmers, or the laborers to address it. We know that these have a real grievance. We know that the bureaucrats have crushed 500,000 small enterprises. We know that the farmer has not only been robbed of his help by the draft and cost-plus contracts, but that he has also been deprived of farm implements and repairs.

We know that the laboring people have a grievance. We know that the average income of industrial workers is still around $40 per week. We know that the coal miners have a real grievance. But so far I have heard no one who favors this bill of having suggested that these grievances be settled on a fair and just basis.

So far I have heard no Member who wants to make it a crime for others to demand justice while at work to offer to go and mine coal. If those who are so much opposed to strikes mean what they say, it might be well for them to offer their services as coal miners or as farm help or to perform other physical labor. They might profit by taking the strikers' place for a while.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] threatens us that we may stay at home if we do not accept his labor-baiting bill. My answer to the gentleman is, We are willing to take our chances.

I hope that we will vote this rule down, because it is unfair and it is unjust to the people who are now supplying and producing the war materials for half the world.

It is unfair not only to those people but it does violence to our integrity and wisdom. We have passed a lot of foolish bills in this House and sent them to the Senate. Our only justification is that the Senate, generally, does not pass them. That saves us from explaining our actions when we get back home.

Permit me to inform the Members of this House that 40,000,000 of our people are laboring people, that these 40,000,000 have just as many sons, brothers, and fathers on the battlefields in Europe, Africa, and Asia as the rest of us.

I would like to inform them that not only have they the sons on the foreign battlefields but they are doing the real work that is winning the war. They are the ones who are supplying half the world with arms, munitions, airplanes, and ships. It comes with poor grace for Congress to question their patriotism and pass a law that we will be ashamed of in the years yet to come.

There is no demand nor any reason for this bill. There is more than enough law now passed to handle every situation as it arises.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of time on this side to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from Ohio is recognized for 1¼ minutes.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I cannot do otherwise than to repeat here the protest I made before the Committee on Rules against bringing to the floor a bill which very evidently has had all too limited hearings. I would call to your attention the fact that the Government departments which have appeared before the committee were opposed to various and sundry sections of the bill. They contended that strikes would be legalized rather than outlawed and that the net result would be to stir up bitterness and make unity in the war effort almost impossible. I want to make it clear at this point that I reserve my right of decision on the bill itself until I know what amendments are to be made part of it, but I do protest the rule.

It is difficult to keep a balanced judgment over this whole strike situation. I confess that it is incredible to me that the men on any of the war-production lines who have sons at the front can consider anything in their own lives of greater moment than unqualified support of the war effort. Marvelous as is the result of labor's effort, miraculous as the production is reported to be, every strike endangers the lives of our fighting men, and every man involved, whether of labor or of management, will eventually have to take his personal responsibility for lengthening the war and so increasing devastation and chaos.

I have no brief for any or all of us who have failed in our responsibility to the widespread need of bettering labor conditions and the consequent living conditions, but I cannot condone any action that increases the war hazard.

I consider the method by which this bill comes to the floor short-sighted in the extreme as it gives justification to labor in its contention that Congress has seen fit to ignore its point of view, which will of necessity create serious disunity in the war effort. I say again, however, that the lives of our fighting men are in the balance. Let us all remember this at all points of our deliberations. If this House takes affirmative action on this bill it will be in an effort to control through the courts a situation which otherwise might even precipitate martial law. Were martial law invoked, by its very nature it would undo all the benefits labor has won for itself. This would be tragic indeed.

I must therefore, Mr. Speaker, protest the rule and hope that the bill may be returned to the committee for adequate hearings.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, this is a rule voted out of the Rules Committee with one dissenting vote for the consideration of the so-called Smith-Connally bill, which was reported out of the Military Affairs Committee of the House with one dissenting vote—and that vote, I am advised, was because the bill was not drastic enough. This House is called upon today to adopt or reject this rule authorizing the consideration of this legislation. I did not seek the responsibility of reporting this rule to the House; I was designated to do so. But I have assumed my responsibility as a member of the Rules Committee, as a Member of the House, and as a Representative of the people of a sovereign State of the Union of the United States.

This bill has been termed an "anti-strike bill," and therefore an insult to labor. As a matter of fact, it is neither. What it is is a bill authorizing strikes under certain conditions and prescribing the conditions under which strikes can be held. I am one of those who believes that no one has a right to strike against his government, and at the appropriate time I shall offer an amendment to make it a felony to incite strikes in plants taken over by the Government. And certainly everyone who agrees with my position that no one has a right to strike against the Government will vote for that amendment.

Another tact is being resorted to here today to again prevent consideration of this type of legislation. You and I know that that is subterfuge. The gentleman from New York and others argue that no hearings were held on this bill, and that, therefore, it should be sent back to the committee for further hearings. Hearings? Mr. Speaker, I hold here a volume of printed hearings of a thousand pages that were had—I grant you not on the Connally bill but on the general subject of strike legislation, including the Wadsworth-Austin bill, the Smith bill, the Colmer bill, and others. Labor was heard on all of that proposed legislation, and, of course, was against it. The Committee on Military Affairs, some of whom would turn about face here today, knew when they voted this bill out what the attitude of labor was. This is but another instance of the machinations and political maneuvering of those who would defeat the bill. The people are sick and tired of this subterfuge and they are not as easily fooled as some of the politicians think they are.

Today several million young Americans, some still in their teens have been drafted into the service of this country to offer themselves as living sacrifices on the battlefields of Africa and Europe and upon the seven seas from Alaska to Tokyo and from Washington to Berlin. These men were drafted into the service of their country by you—the Members of this Congress. Today some of them are shivering and bleeding upon the desolate rock-strewn coasts of Attu Island, others are sweating and dying upon the parched beaches of tropical islands infested with vermin and snakes, while millions of others are being concentrated in Africa and in England for the great invasion push of Europe in an effort to save to posterity and perpetuate the ideals and institutions of our American way of life. You and I have some conception of the impending casualties which such an invasion attempt will bring about. We realize fully that the blue waters of the Mediterranean and the green waters of the Atlantic will run red with precious American blood when that effort starts. Moreover, we realize that the more guns, the more tanks, the more ammunition, and the more planes that these men have to back them up the fewer lives will be lost. You and I and the American people know that our success in Africa was due to the fact that we had more of these guns and tanks and planes than the enemy had.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, today we have the sad spectacle of a half million men engaged in the production of these necessary implements of war out on strike—some of them are striking for one cause and some for another. We have what these boys did not have, an organized minority that threatens to engulf the whole country, bringing pressure to bear on the sovereign representatives of the American people to not even consider a piece of legislation that would insure a continued production of war materials. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for those who would sabotage our war production to call strikes in the gun and plane and tank factories. All that is necessary is to strike at the source of production, which was done in the current coal strike. For we all know that it takes so many tons of coke to make so many tons of coal, and it takes so many tons of coal to make so many tons of steel, and so many tons of steel to make the ships and the planes and the guns and the tanks. By one fell swoop a man by the name of John L. Lewis has paralyzed the whole production program.

And yet we are now urged not to even consider this bill. We are asked to reverse ourselves. Having marched up the hill we are now asked to march back down.

I fully realize, my friends, the political pressure that is being applied to you today. I, too, have received the warnings of the heads of organized labor and their threats. But you and I are not alarmed about this, for you and I know full well that the rank and file of labor—the men who toil before the furnace and on the ships and in the factory—is just as patriotic as the man who wears the uniform and bares his breast to the enemy. Most of these laboring men, too, have sons, brothers, and other kinsmen in the front lines of this war. They as patriotic Americans are not going to hold against you your determination to do your courageous duty by your country and yourselves. Moreover, most of them realize what their leaders fail to see, and that is that labor is as dependent upon public opinion as any other group of people. They realize that after all labor has as much, if not more, at stake than any other class of our people in this war effort. For if we should lose this war labor could easily become a commodity upon the slave markets of Berlin, Rome, and Tokyo.

Mr. Speaker, the eyes of the people of this Nation, from Maine to Mississippi and from New York to California, are upon this House today. For we have been telling them for nearly 2 years now that we in the House have passed legislation to curb this sabotage of our war program but that the other body has pigeon-holed it. The Senate has passed a bill which your Military Affairs Committee of the House has amended. We cannot evade the issue longer. The responsibility is ours. The die is cast. The orders of the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, are today being flaunted. The Government of the United States is today being ignored. And for the first time in the history of this glorious young Republic, men have seen fit to strike against and in defiance of their Government. The Congress is challenged. The people are expecting us to meet our responsibilities. The question to be decided is whether a small organized minority can flaunt the will of the great unorganized masses. The issue is: Will the President and the Congress run the country or will it be dominated by John L. Lewis? A great patriotic American people are outraged today. Constitutional government is threatened. If we cannot adopt this rule and pass this bill then once and for all we should declare ourselves impotent to deal with any question involving labor. The American people expect an affirmative answer. Will they be denied again? Is political preference so much desired that we as members of the greatest deliberative body in the world are willing to be driven like miserable cowards to cover by threats of political retaliation at the hands of a few men who have arrogated unto themselves the right to defy the President and the Congress of the United States and the will of 130,000,000 American people?

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this Congress will accept the challenge. I believe that it will meet the issue and that the prayers of patriotic Americans everywhere will be answered.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 211, nays 163, not voting 58, as follows:

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I was in the cloakroom when the roll was being called the second time and did not hear my name called. I would have voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 796) relating to the use and operation by the United States of certain plants in the interest of the national defense.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 796, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I wish to make this statement and challenge contradiction of it. This bill, as reported by the House Military Affairs Committee, and as further amended by amendments agreed upon which will be inserted in the RECORD at a later time in the day does no harm to organized labor. You will note that I did not even say harm to legitimate organized labor.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman said he challenged contradiction of his statement and I just wanted to challenge it.

Mr. MAY. I do not yield to the gentleman to answer the challenge. He can do it in his own time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to answer some of the criticisms that have been directed at me here even by some of the members of my own committee. To begin with, there were 23 long, hard days of hearings on the subject of manpower and labor with respect to strikes. There were 72 witnesses introduced. I am going to take the time to refer to the record and read the names of those who appeared as representatives of the labor group. Let me add here that I invited, as I have already said today, the leadership of organized labor, to come before the committee to be heard. Some of them came, some sent representatives and some of them ignored the committee. Out of 72 witnesses introduced before the committee, the first man that appeared who represented organized labor was Mr. Lee Pressman, general counsel of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Messrs. Philip Murray, William Green, and John L. Lewis were all advised by me by letter that the hearings were under way. They were each sent a copy of the Smith bill, a copy of the Wadsworth bill, a copy of the Fulmer bill, and a copy of the Connally bill. Beside that, I mailed them a copy of the hearings in the Senate on the Connally bill.

Now, besides that I laid on the desk of every member of the House Military Affairs Committee a copy of the Senate hearings on the Connally bill and asked them if they wanted anything more and they said "No."

In addition to that, Mr. William Green, the gentleman who sent a challenge to the House of Representatives that they "either do my bidding or suffer defeat at the polls" called me up and indulged in a lot of denunciations about the legislation, about its being undemocratic and despotic, and various other vile names that he applied to it. I then asked him if he would respectfully desist for a moment until a humble Member of Congress, bearing a commission from the voters of his district, could be heard, and he said, "What have you got to say?" I said, "I have got this to say, that I wrote you a letter on a certain date in which I said thus and so, and if you wish I will read it to you." He said, "I got it."

I said, "Did you send Mr. Lee Pressman here to represent your organization, and did you send Walter M. Nelson, attorney, and did you read the hearings wherein I said if he had anything else to offer I would like to know what it was?" and he said, "No."

And then it was that I said to him that if labor leadership in this country would adopt the rule of coming to the Congress with something constructive that they would have no trouble in agreeing with Congress on remedial legislation that would take out the objections that they wanted out if they ought to come out. He said he was busy.

Of course, I assume that he knew that I was busy too.

The hearings in this matter started on the 25th day of March. They continued through March 25, 26, 30, and 31; April 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 21, 22, 23, and May 6 and 7. During most of that time some of the critics of the chairman of the House committee were out campaigning or making political speeches.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not an indisputable fact that this general subject and all the chief provisions of the bill now under consideration have been under discussion and consideration for the past 6 to 8 years?

Mr. MAY. That is correct.

Mr. SHORT. By a half dozen committees in both the House and Senate.

Mr. MAY. And that is not all. This House has voted on express provisions of the Smith bill that are involved in this bill on two different occasions in the last 2 years. It was debated at length. I reopened the hearings three times after they were closed. In addition, after they had a meeting in the office of the Secretary of Labor and "cooked up" a round robin and sent a letter to the Speaker condemning the legislation in part and agreeing to it in part, I was generous enough to allow them to have a hearing on the question of whether or not the committee would bring in committee amendments. We have a list of several committee amendments that resulted from those hearings. There is one substantial change they wanted that they did not get. For instance, one or two of them would have liked to reach in and take out the very heart of the bill. The committee did not think we ought to do that, but we adopted clarifying and remedial amendments, which we will print in the RECORD, as I have stated, and which the Members will have an opportunity to consider before the time comes for reading the bill for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

This bill came from the Senate, as everybody knows. The first section relates only to the definition of the terms as used in subsequent sections.

Section 2 of the bill, to which there was some objection, provides that neither the owner or operator of a plant nor a contractor shall conduct a lockout to stop production. The bill requires that in the event one who has a war contract and is operating a plant engaged in war production determines to lock out and quit or shut down, he shall give 30 days' notice of his intention to do so. That was the provision that was originally written in the bill. Even today the committee has authorized the modification of that provision, to the extent that we provide that when notice is given the notice shall specify the reasons and the grounds for such a lockout. That is section 2 of the bill.

Section 3 of the bill provides that if the workers at a plant engaged in the production of war material shall decide that they want to suspend operations, that they want to quit work, they shall give a 30-day notice of their intention to quit work and specify in that notice their reasons therefor. That is what is known as a cooling-off period.

I submit very humbly to the Members of this House that if there is a time in the history of any man when he is likely to make a mistake, it is when he acts under the influence of passion or prejudice, and he should never do that. But if he has an opportunity after he has made up his mind and thinks he is right, or has a doubt about whether or not he is right, to have a period of, say, 30 days to cool off and reconsider and determine and arrive at a proper judgment, is there anything wrong about that? Is there anything wrong about those workers who want to stop production and shut down a plant telling the employer or the contractor why it is they want to do it? That would give him a chance, as I understand it, to meet their objections before the plant is shut down.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I am in favor of the so-called cooling-off provision. My question is, Why should not that cooling-off provision be carried further and require the maintenance of the status quo for that 30-day period, and prevent the Government from stepping in and taking over the plant; in other words, give the owner of a private industry the same protection that the Government will later give itself, and have a period of cooling off on both sides?

Mr. MAY. We have provided for the maintenance of the status quo in this bill.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. The Government steps in, though; am I right in that?

Mr. MAY. Yes; if the Government steps in, of course the Government is in control.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Should not the Government wait 30 days and cool off, too, and protect industry?

Mr. MAY. Of course, the Government could wait 30 days, but the Government of the United States is not going to take over a plant or an industry until every other means has been resorted to, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. I am sure the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will agree, as to the aircraft factories in the West that were taken over by the Government, that if the Government had sent the same number of troops in there to protect the owners of the industry that the Government protected itself with, industry would have produced.

Mr. MAY. Yes, I quite agree, but the Government cannot interfere until there is an interruption of production, and, of course, the interruption of production has to be a major one before the Government will interfere. We undertake to protect the property owner and the contractor by providing in this measure that within 60 days after the causes that brought about the disruption have been removed the property shall be returned to the owner, instead of allowing it to go into Government hands and Government ownership and control and stay there.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Has the constitutionality of the cooling time been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States yet?

Mr. MAY. I do not think it has been passed upon because there has been no occasion to pass upon it, because the Congress up to now, at least that branch at the other end of the Capitol, has refused to pass any legislation providing for a cooling-off period.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. We cannot pass a law against a strike, under the Constitution of the United States, and I believe all the courts agree to that. Now, we seek to postpone by cooling provisions in these boards when they will recognize that undisputed right of freedom. Has any of that circumlocution legislation been passed on by a high court yet?

Mr. MAY. I will say to the gentleman that the courts of this country have already settled finally and unquestionably the right of men to strike, and this committee bill does not interfere with that right, except where war production is involved, but we do say that when a man is mad or angry, or acting in passion, it would be a good idea if he would sit down and scratch his head a few times and think the thing over before he picks up his gun to go out and do violence to his neighbor, and the gentleman from North Carolina no doubt has defended or prosecuted one or the other of such cases—many men charged with murder, and always the indicament charged that it was done in heat of passion. Passion is what leads men to do violent acts.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. If the Chairman will excuse me, I really want information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I shall take time later, because I want to get on with the disposition of this debate.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Perhaps I could contribute something to the matter under discussion if the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. MAY. I yield myself 2 minutes and yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. The right to strike cannot be destroyed until we take out of the Constitution the provision against involuntary servitude. These boards and so on seek to make a man wait to exercise that undoubted right of freedom. I agree with the gentleman that it probably would be a good thing, but what I would like to know is whether or not the Supreme Court of the United States has ever adjudicated the validity of that sort of postponing legislation. I understand that it has not, but if I am wrong, and am so informed, it would greatly influence my vote.

Mr. MAY. That is my understanding, and also let me give the gentleman the value of my judgment. This is a war. We are in the midst of the most desperate war the world has ever seen, and we have drafted men's bodies and souls and sent them to the battle front, and I am satisfied that when the question arises of some man's desire to shut down a plant and stop production, to stop an automobile plant or a tank plant or a gun plant or an airplane plant, and it is under consideration, the Supreme Court of the United States would probably lean backward in order to uphold our contention. I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. But I want to ask the gentleman whether under those war powers—and there I have not any mental trouble, because they are lodged supremely in the Chief Executive, the Commander in Chief. He has the very power that Abraham Lincoln had when he issued the proclamation to free the black people of the South, and he has the power under the Constitution——

Mr. MAY. Oh, I do not yield any further. If the gentleman wants to ask me a question, all right.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I am going to. Has he not the same power that Mr. Wilson had when he seized the railroads of the United States, and what further power can this Congress give Mr. Roosevelt that he does not already possess? And the country anxiously awaits his exercise of that power.

Mr. MAY. I yield myself 2 minutes more time to answer the gentleman, and then I shall yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I really want information.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman voted, I suppose, for the War Powers Act.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I was not here, but I would have voted for it if I had been here.

Mr. MAY. And I take it for granted that he knew what he was voting for.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I say I was not present, but I would have voted for it with pleasure if I had been here.

Mr. MAY. The thing we are trying to do now is to enlarge the powers of some of the President's instrumentalities that he has set up down town, to aid him in enforcing the law, and prohibit the destruction of war production in this country.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina rose.

Mr. MAY. Oh, just a minute.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Oh, let me question the gentleman. I love the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. And I love the gentleman also, but I want to get through. The President has set up under his war powers, the same as those Mr. Lincoln possessed as Commander in Chief, a Board known as the War Labor Board. The President has directed that Board to settle labor disputes, and one individual in this country, the leader of 600,000 workers, has ignored that Board, has defied that Board, has repudiated and denounced it and still repudiates it and denounces it, and what this legislation does is to enable that Board to issue a subpena for that gentleman and bring him in and let him say what he wants to do or at least submit himself to the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, and if he does not do it, then they will have the power under this legislation to apply to a United States district court for an order compelling his attendance, and if he does not come then, he will be in contempt of court and can be dealt with accordingly.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. And will the gentleman not let me ask him the final question?

Mr. MAY. Oh, no. I am sorry I must now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I thought at first that I might have contributed something to the question under discussion. Many Members of the House know that for many years there has been a provision for a cooling-off period in the Railroad Labor Act, and if that has not been tested by the courts, it is because it has worked so satisfactorily that there has been no occasion to test it.

Mr. MAY. Let me say to the gentleman that we were so careful to preserve that right for the railroaders of this country that we excluded all men engaged in working for the railroads from the previsions of this act and left them under the Railway Labor Board Act. The gentleman from Michigan has contributed a fine thought to the debate.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him the one final question?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Has the President of the United States asked for any additional power? Has the War Department asked for any additional power? Has the Navy Department asked for any additional power?

Mr. MAY. I would not say they have asked my committee for any additional power, but, as representatives of a great people, when we discovered that they did not have the power and that production was being obstructed and interfered with in our war effort, we decided to give them the power, and that is what this bill does.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. You could not take it away from them if you tried. Congress could not do it.

Mr. MAY. We are not taking anything from them or him. We are giving them additional powers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I require at this time.

I wash to state briefly that aside from some new refinements there is nothing in this legislation insofar as it affects labor which has not been either in the Smith bill, which passed this House a year and a half ago, or in the present bill, known as the Connally provisions, which came from the Senate about a month ago.

I want to recall to your minds that the provisions of the Smith bill were adopted by this House by a 2 to 1 vote a year ago last fall, shortly before Pearl Harbor, in peacetime. The provisions of the Connally bill passed the Senate by a vote of almost 4 to 1. It is rather interesting to note, and I say this particularly to my Republican colleagues, I recall how many of them have pointed out, when they have been criticized for the nonpassage of the antistrike legislation, that the Smith bill passed the House and died in the Senate. Eleven of the 252 Members who voted for the Smith labor bill were defeated in the following election of 1942. Thirty-five of the 136 Representatives who voted against the Smith bill were defeated in the following election. I say there is nothing unfair to labor in the provisions of this measure today.

A great deal of criticism is made on the subject of no hearings. There have been more hearings on the provisions of these bills, I dare say, than on almost any other bill that has ever come before the Congress in the last 10 years.

The reason Members say there have been no hearings is that they are looking for an excuse to vote against this measure, and that is the only reason. To be sure, the leaders of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. have not been heard in public hearings within the last month before this committee. Is there any Member of the House of Representatives who does not know their viewpoint?

So far as the letter of May 15, sent to the committee over a number of signatures, is concerned, the fact has been established that representatives of the War Department, the Navy Department, the Maritime Commission, and other agencies, met in session at the office of the Secretary of Labor at her request. Had she not made that request I have no doubt that no expression from any of those departments would have been forthcoming.

In view of the fact that numerous Republicans have opposed the passage of the rule, I want to say that a large majority of the Republican Members of the Committee on Military Affairs have worked busily for the passage of this legislation. Those in the service are for it. The people of the country by an overwhelming majority favor it. The time has come to fish or cut bait on this measure.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am very much concerned as to whether or not the opponents of this bill are going to have an opportunity to discuss the bill. Has any provision been made by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee to afford time to the opposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time is within the control of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the ranking minority member of that committee.

Mr. SHORT. Those who oppose the passage of the bill will be afforded an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. No; I want to make a speech here. You will learn something.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, today the Congress of the United States will make history! We are going to decide whether the people in this country shall rule or whether a minority group, most of whom are patriotic, but who are misguided by a few professional racketeers who fatten off the lean earnings of those whom they allegedly support, shall let down their countrymen fighting and dying in foreign lands.

I want it thoroughly understood now that I believe in the right of labor to organize. I believe in unions. I believe in collective bargaining. I believe in the right of labor to strike in times of peace and under normal conditions. But, there comes a time, sir, when all the American people, including labor, which is not apart, but an integral part of our body politic, should deny itself, sacrifice, and suffer with the rest of our entire population. The general welfare of all the people must be placed above that of any particular group.

In support of this bill, sir, I wish to say that it has been most thoroughly considered in both branches of the Congress. Long and exhaustive hearings have been held on the main features of this bill, not only in our own Committees on Military Affairs in the House and the Senate, but also in the Naval Affairs Committees of the House and of the Senate, in the Labor Committees of the House and of the Senate, and all the dilatory, delaying tactics known have been employed to postpone and obstruct the consideration and vote on this legislation. The American people demand action now. Time after time, we have been stalled, deferred, sidetracked, postponed, and put off—and always for an insignificant reason. The Smith bill passed the House in December 1941, immediately before Pearl Harbor by a vote of 252 to 136. When it reached the Senate, certain executive agencies appeared before that body, registered their protest, and it was pigeonholed and forgotten. Only recently when the coal strike threatened a complete break-down of our war-production industry did the Connally bill, which had been postponed from time to time, pass by a vote of 63 to 16, in the Senate.

The present bill under consideration is a combination of the Connally and Smith bills already passed by both Houses of Congress by an overwhelming majority to insure maximum production; to guarantee the men and women of their fathers and mothers back home, the equipment with which to carry on an aggressive and a successful war. The bill was reported unanimously by the House Committee on Military Affairs and a rule was granted several days ago. Since then the executive branch of our Government has again interfered, and certain administrative agencies have done their best—no doubt some of them against their own will—to block the passage of this measure. Of course, in a sense this legislation is unnecessary for the President now has the wartime power to stop these strikes, if only he would exercise it. Why does he fail to act? Could the half-million dollars raised by John L. Lewis for his 1936 campaign have any influence upon him? If some people were as interested in winning this war quickly as they are in a fourth term, the country would not be in its present tragic plight, and we would not be debating this bill today. The chickens are now coming home to roost.

Who, I ask you, are to write the laws of the land—the executive and administrative agencies of our Government or the duly elected Representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States? Is it not our sole prerogative, authority, duty, and responsibility to determine what the laws of this country shall be, without the interference of any other branch or department of Government? How long shall we continue to act as a rubber stamp of the Executive? When will we develop a bone instead of a rubber for a spine? Stand up, speak out, and be counted! Unworthy of being a Member of Congress are you who refuse to do it! Do not duck the issue! Mr.

Chairman, when our house is on fire and the walls are tumbling down around us, I cannot understand why anyone would want to think of his own personal profit or individual gain before putting forth every effort to extinguish the fire that threatens to consume us all. I know that the American Federation of Labor has brashly and rashly threatened to defeat any Member of Congress who votes for this bill. Let us not be scared by such bluff. We will not be intimidated, and we cannot be bribed. This Nation and this Government are still bigger than the American Federation of Labor or any other organized minority pressure group.

While I have very few coal miners in my district, I personally feel that they are at the present time underpaid. Due to the increase in the cost of living, and compared with the wages paid other workers in war industries, these miners who for many weeks in the year never see the light of day, who engage in the most dangerous and arduous kind of labor, should have an increase. The present bill does not deny them an increase, and there is no reason why they, or the workers in the rubber plants at Akron, or the employees of Chrysler, or any other group engaged in the war effort, should go on strike in this crucial hour when we are fighting for our very survival.

Is it possible, Sir, that men drawing the highest wages and living under the best conditions of any people on all the earth, should go on strike, refuse to produce the weapons of war for the men fighting in the front line to defend themselves and preserve the lives and liberties of their loved ones back home? Is it fair for Uncle Sam to draft young men in the flower of manhood, who have spent years in colleges and universities, and thousands of dollars to prepare themselves for professions in which they have earned lucrative remunerations; who drop everything, who forget work, family, home, and loved ones, to fight and die on distant fields and in remote waters for $50 a month, while many of their fellowmen back home, less educated and living in peaceful conditions, distant from the hazards of conflict, drawing higher wages in war industries, go on strike?

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be cynical; I do not want to be unfair, but please tell me, Sir, in the name of God, what are we fighting for? If Uncle Sam can take your boy and your neighbor's son, husband, brother, or father out of his chosen profession—be it law, medicine, dentistry, agriculture, business, or anything else—is it fair for you then to let a fellow back home go on strike in war industries and refuse to produce the weapons by which the soldier, sailor, marine, or pilot is defending himself and protecting his loved ones back home?

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not deny organized labor any of its rights. It does not deny men the right to organize into unions. It does not prevent collective bargaining. It does not deny peaceful picketing. It does not deny the right of labor to appeal to Government for redress of any wrongs. It simply imposes upon labor many of the duties and responsibilities that are already imposed by law upon practically all other groups of our citizenry. As a friend of labor who believes in unions; in its right to organize; in its right to bargain collectively; in its right to strike under normal conditions and in time of peace; I wish to urge that the rank and file of labor, the overwhelming majority of whom are as patriotic as any man on this floor, will put their own house in order, else they will lose all the benefits they have gained in the past quarter of a century.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, is not at all extreme, it is a compromise measure. We have had to give and take. It is temporary legislation only for the duration of this war, and I do hope that all Members, regardless of the stigma that may be stamped upon them, will, in conscience clear and duty free vote unanimously for the passage of this much-needed legislation. Labor, as well as the Army and the Navy must be disciplined. This is total war by total populations. We all swim or sink together. God save this Republic.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, we face a very grave responsibility. We are the representatives of 130,000,000 American people. Our country, too, faces a very serious situation. It is engaged in desperate warfare with three dictatorial powers of the earth. How unfortunate it will be under these circumstances if we cannot avert a further serious situation at home.

It has been said that the great need of the hour is unity. I fear this sentiment has not been properly impressed upon the minds and hearts of some of the American people. It was in a time of war that a great Briton said: "This day England expects every man to do his duty"—every man. It was in a time of war that a distinguished American naval leaders said: "Don't give up the ship." It was in contemplation of conflict that an eminent American statesman said: "United, we stand; divided, we fall." I think it behooves us to profit by the wise counsel of those sage utterances. The great rank and file of the American people, including the American workers, are desperately and vitally interested in preserving and promoting that spirit of unity. The sons of these American workers are fighting on many fronts, on the land, on the sea, and in the air, and these sires, as loyal American citizens, want to see those boys get and get promptly, not too little and too late, the necessary production to carry on their struggle to preserve for you and for me and for posterity the blessings of liberty which have been vouchsafed unto us by a beneficent God.

We all believe in organization; we believe in it for the professions, we believe in it for the trades; but organizations in all times and more especially in times of war have the obligation and responsibility resting upon them to see America first before they see the prosecution of any selfish interest. The labor troubles are not with the fact that labor is organized—it should be organized—but with subversive racketeers many of whom are hostile to the genius of our political philosophy and system and who are seeking to lead astray the patriotic band of Americans who work at every kind of machine and toil at every kind of trade; and it is in order to protect the American worker, loyal and patriotic as he is, that we must do something to show that as the Representatives of the American people, we are trying to inspire and to promote that essential spirit of unity.

It has been said that no further legislation is necessary to stop the strikes which interrupt and delay our effective war effort; nevertheless strikes in this critical period continue. Is there not an obligation resting upon you and me under such circumstances at least to give legislative expression to the unanimous sentiment of the 130,000,000 people whom we represent? This bill may not be perfect; we can amend it and modify it as may be necessary when we come to its consideration under the 5-minute rule.

With reference to this matter of organization, with reference to this matter of strikes by any body of our citizens in any necessary line of endeavor in this trying time, let us suppose that with an epidemic raging, all the doctors, who also are organized, should strike and fail to go to the relief of the stricken people. They would be condemned by popular judgment and by popular utterances. We have today an epidemic facing this country of ours, the epidemic of war and the threatened epidemic of totalitarianism that would make of these very workers serfs and slaves and deprive them of all the benefits that they can enjoy in times of peace or war under our American system. This is an epidemic in which each and every American citizen is a doctor and he must give it the best treatment he can in the field in which he labors. This applies to all workers at their respective tasks, whatever their toil and whatever the nature of their contributions to our triumph.

I am thinking today, not merely of the people at home—loyal and patriotic people will support proper legislation—I am thinking of those boys on many foreign fronts whom we sent to the war and who there are carrying on valiantly to save for us and for posterity the things dear to the American heart and to all free and liberty-living people. They, too, are organized. Suppose they should strike.

Mr. Chairman, in the interest of patriotic American labor, I do not want to see it cut its own throat. I want to see it prosper in accordance with American ideals, but I firmly believe that when these boys come back from the hardships and the privations that they are enduring in so many places, facing the foes who would wipe out all in which we believe, they are going to be the most rugged group of individualists that this country has ever had. Every report we get from them, every conversation we have with those who have returned for a brief furlough, is in absolute and utter condemnation of any man in any walk of life who would strike at his trade today and not make his full contribution to the cause for which they are fighting. Oh, let us be true to these lads. We sent them to preserve this American system of government and to enable us at home to cooperate in assuring its preservation and by the genial influence of example in extending it to all peoples that all the world may be free. Whether a vote to express as their faithful representatives the sentiments of 130,000,000 people means that we shall stay in this Chamber or at the expiration of this Congress depart to private life, it is a vote in accordance with the views and the sentiments of those boys who are fighting your battles and mine, and I am seeking in these troublous times to keep myself true to them. If I do, I shall keep myself true to this land of the free and home of the brave.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, first of all I wish to present some of the facts which I believe represent the background of this bill now before us. First of all, the Military Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, did report this bill unanimously. It did so, as I believe, largely because of the influence upon their minds of the fact that more than 8,000,000 young men and women are now serving in our armed forces and they are entitled to have all of the goods necessary for the proper conduct of the war whenever they need them, wherever they need them, and in sufficient quantities. However, quite a few misleading statements have been made.

If you will turn to page 1018 of the hearings you will realize that there were up to that time only four bills before the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration, and this bill, S. 796, was not one of them. As a matter of fact, S. 796 was not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House until May 6, 1943, and up until page 1018 all of the hearings had been held prior to that time. Obviously no questions were asked bearing upon S. 796, and, as a matter of fact, not a word of the testimony which has been printed in this volume has anything to do with that bill.

This bill was reported unanimously, but it does not represent in every respect and in every section the feeling of the members of that committee, and I think that will be shown tomorrow when amendment after amendment adopted by the committee itself will be offered to cure what the committee now believes to be improprieties, inconsistencies, and perhaps inequities in the bill as it is printed.

With reference to the bill itself, the evidence has been given wholly, as I see it, by witnesses from the Government yesterday and today. If we have in mind particularly the proper settlement of strikes against the Government, in plants taken over and in possession of the Government, plants, industries, or factories, then I think we should give heed to the testimony of Chairman William H. Davis, of the National War Labor Board, who testified this morning. He said that as far as this bill is concerned the only sections in the bill which would be of any advantage to the Government and to his board in the settlement of strikes and in bringing them to speedy and successful conclusions would be sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, and 14. In other words, so much of this bill as represents sections taken from the Connally bill of the Senate which are in this bill which would be of advantage of the board would be those that I have mentioned and he believed that we should leave out section 12. As a matter of fact, the committee has adopted an amendment that I presume will be offered by the chairman tomorrow in which part of that section 12 will be stricken.

Obviously, this legislation is before us from the committee for the purpose of helping the Government operate every business in this country for the benefit of the armed services and the civilian population. There is no intention to hurt any single person or any organization, so far as the committee is concerned, and I think it is obvious that the miners have had a real grievance. That is shown by the decisions of the War Labor Board after hearings, which indicated that these men ought to have more money and that a part of these abuses should be corrected, and I believe they will be. Of course, we cannot permit the absolute shutting down of a factory or a mine which is producing something necessary for the winning of this war, and that is the purpose of the bill. I believe that will be the purpose of the committee as it considers this bill tomorrow for amendment. It will accept such amendments as will accomplish that purpose and finally draft in committee a bill which will accomplish what the membership actually desires.

To me, as we voted on this rule today, I would say that those who voted for the rule did so realizing that there are 8,000,000 young men and women in the service; that there appears to be a possibility that through lack of legislation it is going to be possible for certain factories, certain mines, certain other efforts on the part of the United States and of the people to fail to function. It is possible that some of this failure can be eradicated by the adoption of proper legislation. Certainly Chairman Davis, of the War Labor Board, feels that is true.

With reference to the first seven sections of the bill, they do not have to do with that particular issue and will have to be considered on their merit otherwise. I bring these thoughts to your attention in order that as you consider the bill tonight and as you read the testimony, if you do so, you will do it with that in mind. So far as the first seven sections are concerned, they do not have anything to do with the settlement of strikes which have to do with the proper conduct of the war, other than in the general legislation which you may have that will be beneficial to industry and labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, when I was a young boy I heard one of the great orators of that time make a speech on a trying occasion to the people of my State. It made an impression upon me that has lasted through my life. I only remember one of the sentences he used when he said that as a child his mother taught him when he was a boy to do his duty of the hour and throw defiance to the future.

This is one of the most delicate questions which has ever commanded the attention of this country. One of the troubles now is that we have too much legislation of doubtful constitutionality on the statute books of this country about labor, and the peace officers and the executive officers seem to be afraid to enforce it.

There are two aspects of the labor question, rules and regulations, to be enforced by the courts, the marshals and the officers, and the other war powers which all deal with this thing. There is not a provision in this bill which has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court of our country. Every one of them are of doubtful validity except as they may relate to the war powers. Under the war powers of our Government, as a lawyer, ripe with age, I think the power is absolutely supreme in the executive branch of this Government.

The gentleman from Missouri referred, oh, cruelly, to our President, that the people are demanding action and he would not act; they were angry, they were demanding action. I remember that same thought a while back about military action when he was cruelly abused; he was vilified, and yet in an hour that we did not know approached, he directed the most brilliant strategy ever displayed in warfare on this earth when he quietly, unbeknown to anybody almost, took Africa and enhanced the outlook for a military drive to the satisfaction of everybody. I want to say to my friends, compose yourselves in patience. This great patient President of ours, with a mind as brilliant as has ever adorned the statesmanship of this or any other country, is thinking; he is praying, he is working, and before John Lewis and his followers know what has happened, Franklin D. Roosevelt, our commander in chief and our President, will show him the power and the majesty of this great Government. He is not asking for this law; the War Department is not asking for it; the Navy Department is not asking for it.

Some gentlemen undertake to speak for the boys under the flag and say they want it. They want to preserve the basic rights of freedom as well as anybody else, and I want to say to them that that great army of heroes who are struggling for the perpetuation of liberty on earth is not a class army. In its ranks will be found probably a greater number, numerically speaking, of sons of laboring people than any other class, struggling and dying everywhere, men in mortal combat; and, the sons and the members of families of wealthy people of the country are there. It is no class army; the sons of the wealthy, when they are called, are under the flag and all our available young men are showing the very highest fortitude and courage ever displayed on this earth.

The wealthiest young man in my State, Dick Reynolds, who, by the way, is treasurer of the great political party to which I belong, is somewhere on a dangerous mission, in the dangers of the Pacific area on a carrier where he sought and worked to be placed, ready to die, with a smile upon his face for his country, although he is the wealthiest man south of here before you come to New Orleans, if not in the entire South. And every one of them are appealing to every group, to all of us to do our duty. Our farming people are doing their duty. There is a little selfishness in every group. Small minorities everywhere want something they ought not to have, but the great majority have exhibited a fortitude and courage and nobility for which our ministers have prayed these long years, and to raise which our statesmen have toiled. Let us unite; let us unite under the leadership of a party President. I am an old man, older than I look, but I have been a citizen under several wars, and under at least one Republican President. But I make an appeal to all who hear me that you realize we cannot overthrow our Government as you can a parliamentary Government. It is in for the duration and the only thing to do is to unite under the leadership of our great Commander-in-Chief of the Army and of the Navy and of the combat forces everywhere; forget a little politics.

When I came to Congress I took one pledge, that I would uphold and support the Constitution of the United States as I would have to do when I took my oath, and so help me God, I would keep that oath, and I would make no other pledge. I am as free a man as ever represented a congressional district here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. May I have a minute and a half more?

Mr. MAY. I am sorry; I am pressed for time.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. You are missing a mighty good peroration.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I have been sorely troubled by the situation that has brought about the need for the legislation we are considering today. I voted for the rule making the consideration of this bill in order, but I voted for the rule because I felt there is a definite problem relating to labor relations that this Congress must deal with at once.

This bill should certainly be considered by the House as only through such debate can the country really understand its provisions. Many people assume that this legislation will prevent strikes in essential defense industries. The truth of the matter is that it does nothing of the sort.

I have previously stated on the floor of the House that so far as I am concerned by no vote of mine will I permit any man or group of men to retard the production of war material. The Connally-Smith bill as we have it before us now—and not knowing what amendments will be offered during its consideration—will not prevent strikes in essential defense industries.

I have many frends working in defense industries and I certainly do not want to stigmatize my friends and neighbors who are now working harder and longer hours than they have ever worked before in their lives, by voting for a piece of legislation which in their minds, and the minds of a great many people is going to put a rope around their necks. Not only will it put a rope around their necks but will make them appear to be part of a group that must be forced by the Federal Government to produce war material that their own sons and brothers are using on every front in every part of the world.

I read every word of the hearings held on the Connally bill in the Senate and closely followed the debate in that body. It appears to me that the Connally bill, in substance, legalizes the activities of the War Labor Board; gives that Board power to subpena witnesses and records, as well as legalizing the taking over of defense industries by the President, in which there are labor disputes.

When the Burke-Wadsworth Selective Service Act was enacted into law, I was in Congress, and I clearly recall the debate on section 9 of that bill. Section 9 is the section under which the President has taken over various defense industries in which there were labor disputes. It was never the intent of Congress that this section should ever be used for any such purpose. The language of that section clearly provides that, in case any manufacturer refuses to produce war material needed by the Government, the Government under those conditions could take over the factory and operate it. No one ever contended that this section gave the President power to take over an industry simply because it was involved in a labor dispute.

Under the Connally bill, any six men in any given defense industry could create a situation which would force the President to take over that industry.

After the Connally bill was passed by the Senate and came over to the House Military Affairs Committee, that committee added the provisions of the so-called Smith bill to the Connally bill. The first seven sections of the Connally-Smith bill has no bearing whatever on the prevention of strikes in essential defense industries. How many of those sections will still be in the bill when this debate is finally concluded no one can say, but as it stands now you will find just about every labor-baiting proposal we have heard discussed in the cloak rooms of Congress for the past 4 years.

I am fearful that organized labor in this country will rue the day it decided to openly accept the benevolence of the Federal Government. In the long run labor would have been better off to have gone along as it had for so many years, building up its own strength as a result of what it accomplished for labor. Organized labor cannot continue to accept the favors, if you will, of the Federal Government and remain a free democratic organization.

What has the filing of financial statements by labor organization to do with antistrike legislation? What has the section forbidding the making of contributions to political parties to do with antistrike legislation? Why is it proposed to go back to the evils created by the use of injunctions in labor disputes? Why not consider these proposals under a separate bill and not becloud the issues involved in this legislation?

This bill, as reported by the Military Affairs Committee practically repeals the Norris-LaGuardia Act. This is simply a case of trying to solve too much in one piece of legislation and, as so often is the case, end by solving nothing.

At the outset I said there was a problem that this Congress must solve and that problem is enacting a law that will adequately punish any individual or group of individuals who attempt to sabotage our war effort. This could be done by writing a comparatively simple bill. A bill which first of all provides, as does one section of the Connally bill, the legalizing of the creation of the War Labor Board and furnishing that board with power to subpena witnesses and records. Also include a section providing that after a labor dispute has been referred to the War Labor Board and a decision rendered by the board, labor and management would be compelled to accept the ruling of the board.

Certainly no fair-minded person could hanestly contend that the War Labor Board, appointed by the President, was antilabor. I would gladly support legislation providing a substantial jail sentence for anyone who refused to abide by the decision of a legally constituted War Labor Board. It is impossible to legislate cooperation. It is impossible to legislate morale in our defense plants. On the whole, the morale in the various defense industries is very good. The 12,000,000 men and women who make up organized labor in the United States are just as loyal as any other group of citizens. They have just as many—and possibly more—sons and daughters, fathers and husbands in our armed services than any other group of a like size. In our disgust at the acts of certain selfish labor leaders we are in danger of approving legislation that will prove definitely harmful to the war effort. We certainly are not justified in approving the Connally-Smith bill because of the acts of this small group of so-called labor leaders.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss in the short time I have the amendments the committee acted on favorably this morning and that it proposes to offer when the bill is taken up for amendment under the 5-minute rule. If those of you who have copies of the bill will get them out, I shall try to take up the amendments one at a time in order that you may be made familiar with them.

In that connection, let me say that in the hearings we held yesterday and today some very helpful suggestions were made to our committee. I believe I am safe in saying that we acted favorably upon every single recommendation made to us by the agencies who signed that letter in opposition to this legislation, with the exception of one, and that one was a proposal to eliminate sections 2 and 3 of the bill. I feel certain that an amendment will be offered on the floor of the House for the purpose of eliminating those sections. Our committee was pretty evenly divided on the question of eliminating the sections, and my guess is that our vote in the Committee of the Whole when that amendment is offered will follow pretty much the same line as it did in the committee meeting this morning.

If you will follow your bill, I shall call your attention to the proposed amendments.

The first one, on page 8, is a very minor amendment. It is in line 22, and the same amendment is to be offered in line 23, where the two words "may be" occur. Those words are to be changed and the word "are" is to be substituted so as to make it read "are required" and "are useful in connection therewith."

The next amendment is to be found on page 9, line 13. After the word "lock-out" insert the words "and the issues involved in the dispute giving rise thereto." Then, at the end of that same sentence, in line 18, insert the words "and the issues involved in the dispute giving rise to such intended strike."

On page 10, in line 13, is to be found the next proposed amendment. After the word "and", the very last word in the sentence, insert the following: "to include on such ballot a concise statement of the major issues involved in the dispute together with a statement of the position of each party with respect thereto; and."

All three of these last amendments, as you can see, are related to the same matter. They simply provide that on the ballot and in the notices the issues involved must be set forth.

On page 10, line 16, which is the very end of the section, add the following: "No ballot shall be conducted under this section when any issue involved in the intended strike has been determined by statute or by any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant thereto."

Of course, should the amendment which I anticipate, to strike sections 2 and 3 from this bill, be adopted, then the proposed amendments I have just suggested in those two sections would have no place in the bill.

On page 11, line 12, after the word "contractor" insert the following words: "or officers of a local labor organization of which said bona fide employees are members."

That section makes it unlawful for picket lines to be maintained by persons who were not just prior to the strike bona fide employees of that particular plant, but this provision is added in order that officers of that particular local who might be in some neighboring plant but not in that particular plant could have access to the plant and to the plant property.

On page 13, line 12, will be found the next proposed amendment. At the end of line 12 as it stands now, insert the following language:

Provided, That the penalties provided in this subsection shall extend to the local union or unions or other portion of the labor organization concerned in, connected with or participating in such violation and to no other portion thereof.

This subsection provides briefly that if any union violates the provisions of this previous section, it shall lose its status as a representative or labor organization under the National Labor Relations Act, and so forth. Some unions may be organized in such a way that without this amendment it would mean the whole national or the whole international organization would be penalized. This amendment will place the penalty only upon the particular local, or the particular part of the union that may be participating in the strike.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. In other words, it means that if there is an individual coal mine somewhere and there is dispute there, then it will be confined to that, and not involve the whole international union.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct. On page 15, line 23, after the word "regulation" insert the one word "heretofore." That section defines the provisions of the War Labor Board, and may I say in that connection that in setting up this section defining the duties of the National War Labor Board, that we tried as well as we could to set it up in keeping with the Executive orders that have been issued to this date, and the regulations thereunder, and Mr. William A. Davis, chairman of the War Labor Board testified before us this morning that he thought sections 8, 9, 10, 11, 13 and 14, were pretty good sections.

On page 18, line 10, after the word "strike", insert the two words "or lockout," in order to make it applicable to both classes of work stoppages. In keeping with the recommendations that were made by the various agencies, we struck out section 12, or at least so much of it as they objected to, and we proposed to save that very last clause in section 12, and do that by inserting a new section 12, to read as follows, and it is the substance of the last sentence in the present section 12:

Sec. 12. When possession of any plant, mine, or other property has been, or is hereafter taken by the Government under authority of section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, or otherwise, by reason of a strike, lock-out, threatened strike, threatened lock-out, work stoppage, or other cause, such plant, mine, or other property shall be returned to the owners thereof as soon as practicable, but in no event more than 60 days after the termination of the conditions which caused possession of such plant, mine, or other property to be so taken.

There are two other amendments that I failed to call attention to as we went through the bill. On page 17, lines 6 through 9, it is proposed to strike out the language reading as follows:

In no event shall the Board have power under this act or otherwise to require as a condition of employment that any individual become or remain a members of a labor organization.

Also to strike out subsection (c), which immediately follows that. The reason for doing that is that it is carried in section 9 of this bill, and that is the power of subpena to the National War Labor Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON].

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who opposed the rule on this legislation, not because I am opposed to it, but because I felt we had not had sufficient hearings or time on some of the important matters in this bill. How does this legislation happen to be before us? It comes before us because a labor leader, leading half a million men, has defied the President of the United States. How did he do that? What brought this situation about? You will remember that several years ago this labor leader submitted a matter to one of the labor boards of the United States. A decision was handed down against his contention. The average person would submit to such a decision like any American would, but he said "No, I do not want to submit to this decision." What happened? The President of the United States suggested an arbitration, and the controversy was as to whether there should be a closed shop in the mine-workers union, and the President had previously publicly declared he was against the closed shop principle. What happened? The very arbitrator, the third man on this board of arbitration, that the President of the United States appointed, decided the case in favor of Mr. Lewis and contrary to the expressed opinion of the President. So, in a way, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] pointed out, the man that now is causing trouble, slowing down production in the United States is the one who was built up by the President of the United States, who was coddled by him and from whom he took campaign funds.

I say that it is a bad situation when we get excited and then try to legislate, and that is the reason I wanted more time to consider some features of this bill. We all admit that labor, like every other group, must make some concessions during the war. We hear men get up here and talk in the Well of the House about the men overseas, in all parts of the world. They get excited about these things, and some of us who want more time and hearings, so we may write sound legislation, know what the soldiers have to contend with. Some of us who talk, and who you may think delay this legislation, have heard the whistle of machine guns, the crack of the antiaircraft guns, and we have heard the explosion of whizbangs, and we are just as anxious to help our boys as those who never served in a war.

One of the reasons we wanted time on this is because this law restores the right of injunctions in labor disputes. After many, many years of experiment, it is found that that was the wrong way to handle labor disputes, and now for 10 years we have gone along and refused to handle them in that way.

This bill restores that right. I am afraid, and some of the other committee members are afraid, that it is going to make every labor dispute that arises tried in the Federal courts instead of the various administrative agencies that have for 10 years handled labor disputes.

We are going to offer amendments to sections 2 and 3: I want to read to you what the agencies of our Government have said regarding those provisions. I want to make this point quite clear again, that there never was one single hearing, there is not a single line of testimony in the transcript of the hearings on the identical bill that is presented to Congress here. It was not until after these administrative agencies had written letters to the Speaker, and some of us asked that they be called and heard that the people who are responsible for production for war were invited to come before our committee and advise us. Here is what those people said:

The War Department, the Navy Department, the United States Maritime Commission, and the War Production Board, being the agencies primarily responsible for the production and procurement of war materials, are unanimous in their judgment that some sections in the bill as presently drawn would tend to interfere with such production and procurement by stimulating industrial unrest.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. LEROY JOHNSON. I have only 8 minutes. If I have time remaining, I will yield.

The Department of Labor, the National Labor Relations Board, and the four public members of the National War Labor Board, these being the Federal agencies primarily concerned with the maintenance of orderly industrial relations, concur in this view and believe that the bill, as it stands, would impair the effectiveness of the existing machinery for the orderly settlement of labor disputes.

They were referring to sections 2 and 3 of the bill.

Now, we have this situation: The President sat down with the labor unions of the United States and with the producers of the United States, and they voluntarily agreed to a no-strike arrangement during the duration of the war. I believe that on the whole, with only this one bad exception of the mine workers, the labor unions have adhered to this policy. The trouble with section 2 is that instead of allaying strikes and reducing industrial unrest, it will stimulate strikes. I think that during this 30-day waiting period men will be thinking of their coming strike and trying to work up their organizations instead of putting their minds to production and things they should do to make the winning of the war and production a success. As I say, we are not hostile to any legislation of this kind. We think that legislation of this kind for the duration of the war is necessary, but we want it to be reasonable. We want it to be fair. We want to recognize that on the production lines of America are 30 or 40 million men and women. Those men and women have children in the armed forces of the United States. The great mass of them are patriotic. We do not want to punish that great mass because of the sins of a few who get out of line.

So when we come to sections 2 and 3, it is my conviction that the law will be better without those two sections. There are other things that curtail the rights of labor. Labor and the farmers and everybody else have to give up some of their rights during the war. We have a great mass of workmen in the labor unions who are perfectly willing to have those rights curtailed. They are willing to have reports made. They are willing that their union should not give money to political organizations. It was merely to get more evidence on those matters that some of us asked for more time.

It is too bad that this debate has taken on so much heat. People get excited over these matters, and their emotions get aroused. We should approach it from a more calm and deliberate attitude and not be swayed because there is a lot of excitement in the air at the present time.

Unfortunately during the past few weeks we have had an epidemic of strikes. We have had them in Baltimore, Milwaukee, Akron, Sacramento, and the great coal strike which covers over a dozen States. The pledge made by labor is, to that extent, not being kept. The leaders have not been able to hold their men in line. Strikes in war industries are not proper, when the men who are fighting our battles need the tools of war so badly. It is bad for the morale of these soldiers and sailors; it is bad for the morale of our people, many of whom are making terrific sacrifices to help the progress of the war.

That is why I am willing to enact some reasonable and fair legislation for the duration of the war, the purpose of which is to help labor keep its ranks in line. I am positive the laboring men will understand that those of us who are sympathetic to labor's cause will understand that we are passing this legislation with the sole thought of helping develop a winning war program.

For this reason I urge my colleagues of the House to support the amendments suggested in this short talk and others that will be offered to make the bill as reasonable as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEWART] 5 minutes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, out of the hinterlands, on the high seas, the battlefronts, above the clouds, the people of America are watching us today—watching to see what we are going to do about the most burning issue in America.

Mr. William L. Green has said the American Federation of Labor will endeavor to vote out of office any of us who support this Smith-Connally bill. I am wondering just how many members of his own ranks Mr. Green speaks for. Not all the men who carry his union cards believe in the hijacking and racketeering practices of the organization to which they belong. Many of them are honorable citizens who are in there because the Government has supported such setups and they were compelled to join before they could work for their Government. I do not believe Mr. Green speaks for them. In fact, I believe he speaks only for himself and a few others of his ilk who have become so entrenched that they can play tiddly-winks with the sacred precepts we have cherished and fought for through the centuries, and are fighting for today. I do not believe he could vote any of us out of office; I wager my seat in this body that he cannot, for I intend to support this measure for all that is in me.

I know of 72,000,000 other representatives of labor who do not share Mr. Green's sentiments—the 72,000,000 American laborers who do not belong to any kind of labor union. Many of them have expressed themselves to me. They want action against these laborites who are fattening their pocketbooks at the public's expense. In fact, they cannot understand why action has not already been taken. In their eyes anyone who would highjack the war effort of his own country to further his own selfish aims is a traitor. They have told us, their Representatives, how they feel, and to my ears Mr. Green's threat is drowned out by their voices. I am going to do everything I am big enough to do in trying to carry out their wishes. I believe we should set up labor regulations by law rather than by elastic edicts that can be issued today, modified tomorrow, and repealed next week.

The testimony on this bill dealt with the Smith feature of it; that is the only controversy; that is what all the testimony was about. This Connally bill was not even a balloon of appeasement. It merely gives the Federal Government the right to take over private property for organized labor to operate as it pleases. Right now in my district the Labor Department is trying to compel a war contractor to enter into a closed-shop contract and cause many a citizen in my district to pay further tribute to organized labor in the way of union fees, all of which will have to be met by the sale of War bonds.

The day will come—I wish it were this day—when American patriots will receive their own. The American War Dads are organizing in America to the tune of 25,000 a day. They are the men who have sons, sons-in-law, nephews, or wards in the armed services and they are cooperating with the American Legion. Had it not been for the American Legion fronting against these un-American organizations, God knows what would have become of us today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FENTON].

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor at this time to relate to the membership of the House the manner in which this legislation was drafted, its history, and the amount of time given, specifically, to the provisions of S. 796.

This is done not only to inform you of my feelings in the matter, but also to let you know that notwithstanding the publicity that went out all over the country that the Committee on Military Affairs was unanimous in reporting out this bill to the House, that it was anything but unanimous in considering the bill in committee, section by section.

From March 25 to May 6 or 7 the House Military Affairs Committee has had under consideration four separate bills, namely, the Smith bill, H. R. 2239, the Wadsworth-Austin bill, H. R. 1742, the Colmer bill, H R. 992, and the Fulmer bill, H. R. 1728.

Both the Smith bill—and this was not the same Smith bill passed by the House in December 1941—and the Wadsworth-Austin bill were given rather extensive hearings. Many witnesses for and against these two bills testified before our committee. In fact most of the 70 or 75 witnesses testified on these two bills. There were only 2 or 3 witnesses that testified for H. R. 1728, including the author, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER]. The Colmer bill, H. R. 992, had no witnesses if I recall correctly, although it was on our desks and up for consideration. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] filed a statement with the committee. These 4 bills were classified as manpower bills and my understanding was that after due consideration had been given them that a subcommittee would draft a bill—a manpower bill—embracing the acceptable features from the 4 bills under consideration.

The hearings were concluded with the testimony of the Honorable Paul V. McNutt, the Chairman of the War Manpower Commission, Thursday, May 6, and the subcommittee drafted the bill now under consideration by the House. The first time the full committee saw the bill was Tuesday, May 11, and we were informed by our chairman that action, definite action, had to be taken and the bill reported immediately. The bill was read as writte by the subcommittee, and not any of the subject matter of the four considered bills was included, as far as I can determine. The bill as given us was a substitute for the Connally bill, S. 796, which passed the Senate May 5, 1943. This bill, presented us by our subcommittee, was a mixture of the Smith bill of 1941 and the Connally bill, S. 796. I might say that the only portion of the current Smith bill, H. R. 2239, that we had an opportunity to act on was that section relating to prohibiting supervisory employees to join a union or organization for the purpose of collective bargaining. This amendment was defeated.

The full committee had no opportunity to study the Connally bill as passed by the Senate because it was only brought to our attention on May 11, and we did not have much time to give it consideration or thought. Our committee did not hear any testimony whatsoever on the Connally bill.

That portion of the current bill which extends from page 7 to page 15, line 16, is taken from the Smith bill of December 1941. No hearings or testimony was heard. The rest of the bill with the exception of section 11—which was also from the Smith bill of 1941—was taken from the Connally bill. Section 14 is a combination of both the Smith and Connally bills.

There is the history of the present bill. We certainly had no opportunity to study the various sections of the bill or their ramifications as thoroughly as we should.

The reason I voted to report this bill out from the committee is because I do not favor "pickling" any bill in a committee simply because I or anyone else disagrees with it or some of its provisions.

But getting back to this bill and the House Military Affairs Committee: Like one of our distinguished colleagues in the House, I believe that our committee should get back to and consider military and War Department business, and not usurp the legislative functions of another committee of this body.

I recall distinctly, at the beginning of this session of Congress, the great howl that was set up when the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee claimed the right to legislate for all kinds of transportation, including aeronautics. There was a lot of indignation over this in the Military and Naval Affairs Committees. And, in this instance, I believe that questions relating to labor should be considered by the Labor Committee.

This bill, as I see it, is purely a labor bill—especially the Smith portion of it. It is aimed primarily at labor leaders. The question in my mind is, Was this bill dumped into our laps because there is a dispute between the United Mine Workers and the coal operators? Or is this bill before us because the leader of the United Mine Workers of America is a man by the name of John L. Lewis?

The bill is certainly not before us because anyone in the entire coal fields believes that the miner is getting too much money. It most assuredly is not before us because of any question of the miner's patriotism or loyalty to his country. You cannot accuse the miner of a desire to see his son who is in the armed forces of the United States handicapped because of a desire to get a decent living wage for the rest of his family; especially, after he has lived up to his contract and long after many other industries have given their employees increases in wages, including the Government of the United States.

I wonder whether the public, and especially those who love to kick the miner around, realize what a hazardous occupation mining really is? I am afraid some of you do not. I would like to take some of these labor baiters with me into the bowels of the earth to show them what a real he-American goes through day after day, down in the depths of the earth where the miner knows not whether he will ever see the light of day again; down a thousand feet or more where the miner loses the sunshine and fresh air which we know are so necessary to maintain health. Yes; down in the mines where the miner breathes the dust which causes anthracosis or what is commonly called miner's consumption. I am sure if those who do not believe that the miner has a just grievance could see for themselves these conditions, they would change their opinions.

My colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY], who represents the northern anthracite section of Lackawanna County, Pa., gave the House last Friday facts and figures concerning the present controversy. I will not take time to discuss it here, but I do recommend that you read his remarks in the RECORD.

Certainly not any of us want a strike or a lock-out, especially in these trying days. But all you hear is that the miner should not do this or do that. To say that anyone, especially the miner, who dares to ask for an increase in wages, is unpatriotic, is trying to scuttle our war effort, and is aiding our enemies, is as far from being a fact as anything can be. As I said before, the United Mine Workers of America have had a contract and have lived up to it until its expiration. All they want is a new contract with an increase in wages. Certainly they have a right to that, especially when they are considered so indispensable to the war effort and when other industries—so dependent on coal—are spending money right and left—yes, perhaps even the Government's money. Yes, men in some industries are making $10, $15, and even $20 per day. Everybody knows that, and yet you do not hear a "peep" out of anyone on that score or we do not pass any legislation of any consequence to prohibit that sort of thing. Yet even the War Labor Board denies the miner a raise in wages.

It is admitted in the report of the committee that this proposed legislation is necessary because of the coal situation. It, however, does more than that—it strikes at American labor generally.

My fellow colleagues, I plead with you not to act in haste and destroy in a few hours the united efforts and sacrifices which have been made in the common cause of defeating an enemy who would destroy our liberty and freedom. We are on the threshold of victory on the far-flung battle fronts; let us not destroy the home front which is making that victory possible for our fighting men and the fighting men of our allies. Passage of this bill could only mean another Pearl Harbor of our own making. If any new legislation is needed for regulatory purposes over labor and industry, let us legislate in a sound and sane manner that will help to preserve the liberty-, freedom-loving America for which our boys are fighting and giving their lives. We cannot and must not be responsible for destroying America from within by passing ruthless, dictatorial legislation of which only a Tojo, Mussolini, or Hitler could be guilty.

I beg you to defeat this legislation unless it is amended to eliminate the evil proposals that have and will contribute to the downfall of those who have adopted such Hitler-like policies and laws. Let us not destroy the liberty and freedom for which our boys at this very moment are giving their lives to preserve for us and future generations.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how the time stands?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has 37 minutes remaining; the gentleman from New York has 42.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood. I believe in the rights of labor; I believe in labor's right to organize for collective bargaining and even to strike in ordinary times. I think the people who toil with their hands are some of the finest people in the world. They have justly earned the rights that should be maintained at all times. In December 1941, when we voted for the declaration of war we did certain things from which we cannot run away; we did certain things that had to apply to every individual in this country, to each one of the 132,000,000 people. It has meant that we have given up many of these so-called social gains, and luxuries of life. Many ideas that we thought we could even hang onto for the duration of the war have had to go out the window. Out in my district you can find farm women driving tractors and holding little babies—tiny babies less than 6 months old—on their laps as they go down through a dusty field.

It is not a pleasant thing for the United States to tear a man away from his family and perhaps from his tiny children and send him to a distant land to fight and perhaps die for his country. Yet, we do it. It is not a pleasant thing to vote for laws restricting the rights of labor, but it must be done.

We do not like that sort of thing, but we all have to work together to win this war. I wonder if there is one here who contends that strikes of any kind will help us win this war. After all, a strike is nothing more nor less than mass idleness. With the greatest job ahead that this country has ever had to do, can we afford to have idleness even on an individual scale, to say nothing of an organized scale of mass idleness? There is no place for it in wartime economy. I maintain that no one has the right to strike against the public safety.

This Government under the Constitution has whatever power is necessary to win this war. Alexander Hamilton said:

> Every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

If the boys carrying guns, when they are given a certain order to execute in this war effort struck and said to their military superiors they would not do this, everyone agrees that would be wrong. I ask now, What is the difference between a strike on the part of an individual carrying a gun and a strike on the part of an individual making that gun? If it is wrong for the man carrying the gun to strike, if it is wrong for the man making the gun to strike; if it is wrong for the man making the steel to make the gun to strike, it is wrong for the man who is mining the coal to make the steel to make the gun to strike. We are all together in this war. We will win it together or we will lose it together.

I realize that much has been said about what our soldiers might think of certain legislation; nevertheless, I feel that the soldier morale is something we must maintain at all costs. I want to read to you a little bit from two letters from soldiers in my district. The first one is from Corp. James Nelson, son of Ida Nelson, of Holdrege, Nebr. Among other things this article goes on to say:

> Corporal Nelson has been brought back to the States as a trainig officer in jungle fighting. About his actual experiences he has very little to say, but when it comes to expressing his impressions of everyday experience in the Army he can be exceptionally fluent.
> The favorite gripe, says Nelson, of the boys in combat in the South Pacific is to get papers from the States telling about strikes in war plants and absenteeism.

I want to read from another letter coming from the South Pacific. This boy's name is James E. Chadderdon. He returned to Lincoln, Nebr., after 3 months. It says:

> James E. Chadderdon, former Holdrege resident, returned to Lincoln Monday after 3 months on Guadalcanal after having been honorably discharged from the Army with the assertion that if he was able to find a job in a war plant "I will work 12 hours a day."
>
> James, son of Mr. and Mrs. L. E. Chadderdon, called at American Legion headquarters with his father, a Legion member, and paid his dues. He gave R. C. Patterson, State adjutant, $5 and told him to keep the change and buy playing cards for the boys in the South Pacific.
> Chadderdon said that the men on Guadalcanal were not very friendly toward the labor unions in this country. "After you have been in the front lines for 4 days without much food or rest you don't have much respect for fellows that complain about working 40 hours unless they get overtime," he remarked. "I'm going to try to find a job where I can work 12 hours a day."

If this legislation means something to the boys who are far away from home; who are hungry, weak and tired; who are discouraged and blue; who may have the feeling at times that they are deserted, and they have the hardest job in this whole war effort; we ought to pass the legislation. We ought to say to those boys that the great Congress of the United States believes that this is everybody's war and that every individual should serve and should sacrifice. We ought to say that if it is wrong for a man carrying a gun to strike, it is wrong for a man making guns to strike; and if that is wrong, then it is wrong for men mining coal to make the steel for these guns to strike.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I agree with the gentleman that even one strike in these days is bad, but I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not after reading the bill he believes the passage of this bill is going to stop the strikes of men who feel that they ought to strike?

Mr. CURTIS. I think it will. I think the labor people of the United States are patriotic and they are not going to violate the law. If the Congress of the United States speaks out against their leaders and makes such an action unlawful, the rank and file of labor of America are law-abiding, they are patriotic, and they are not going to violate the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I apologize for trespassing further on the time of the House today, but I asked for the time merely to call attention to the fact that at the appropriate time I propose to offer a simple amendment to this bill which would do just one thing and one thing only. That is, it would make it a felony to conspire to strike against the Government. That is to say, to strike in any plant that this Government has already taken over. That is all in the world it would do.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ROWE. Does the gentleman mean to strike under any circumstances?

Mr. COLMER. I mean to say it would be a felony to strike against the Federal Government. I mean to say that a man working in a war plant taken over by the Government has no more right to strike against the Government than those boys sitting in uniform in the gallery have to desert the colors in time of battle. That is what I mean to say and I propose to offer such an amendment. If there were nothing else in this bill except that one thing it would do the job.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. When the gentleman says "strike against the Government," he means a strike in a plant that the Government has taken over and is now operating?

Mr. COLMER. That is exactly what my amendment proposes to do. A question has been asked, Will legislation against strikes be effective? I say yes, legislation can be effective and I say further if this amendment had been written into the law prior to this you would not have the coal strike today because my amendment would strike at the very foundation of strikes. The average laboring man is just as patriotic as the average man who wears the uniform. The trouble is the laboring man is suffering from bad leadership.

If you strike at the source of this thing and make it a felony for the leaders to call these strikes, especially where the Government has taken over the plant, and that is as far as this amendment goes, you would not have any trouble.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. Is it not well to make a distinction between the man who works in a factory and the man who serves in the Army? You cannot coerce one like the other.

Mr. COLMER. I agree with the gentleman that no legislation affecting labor could be written that would suit the gentleman. I realize that. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is as follows:

Amendment proposed by Mr. COLMER to S. 796:

Page 22, after line 23, insert:

"CONSPIRACY TO INTERFERE WITH GOVERNMENT OPERATION

"SEC. 14. Any person who shall willfully, during the present war or during the period of national emergency as proclaimed by the President on May 27, 1941, conspire with one or more persons for the purpose of bringing about (a) a cessation of production at any plant, mine, or other property in the possession of the United States, (b) a slowing down of production at any such plant, mine, or property, or (c) any other interference with production at any such plant, mine, or property, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

Page 23, line 2, strike out "14" and insert "15."

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, with upward of 500,000 coal miners on strike, and with frequent strikes occurring in important war industries, it is imperative that Congress do something about it. Certainly the country expects Congress to take action.

I voted for the rule which made consideration of the Connally bill, as amended by the Military Affairs Committee of the House, in order. That vote has no significance, so far as the merits of the question are concerned; rather it was a vote to bring the whole problem out in the open so that the Congress of the United States might consider it and take suitable action.

We are at war—a war that is taxing our strength and resources to the maximum. We must win that war if we are to continue a free people.

Many of the strikes that have been called have been over the question of jurisdiction. Should a certain job be done by members of the steam fitters' or plumbers' union? Too many times such a controversy has resulted in strikes that have seriously impeded the prosecution of the war by delaying production of most needed war material. We have had strikes in nearly every war activity and the loss in production runs into millions of man-hours.

In the islands of the South Pacific our boys are fighting and many of them are dying needlessly for the lack of war material.

I ask you if this condition should be permitted to continue? Will not Congress, along with certain unscrupulous labor leaders, be charged with sabotaging our war effort if we fail to act to correct now this maladjustment in production?

Some labor leaders shriek to high heaven against Congress taking any action on this most important subject. There is little question but that the Connally bill was unnecessarily severe in some respects, but the House Military Affairs Committee has already eliminated several objectionable features. On the other hand, as amended, the measure contains provisions that every laboring man should approve.

Some of the more important provisions of the measure before us are that workers must give 30 days' notice of intention to strike and the reasons for such intended strike. No strike shall be called until decreed by a majority vote of the union, cast by secret ballot of the workers. Under the operation of the measure jurisdictional disputes, boycotts and sympathy strikes are outlawed and acts of violence and threats will be suitably dealt with.

As I understand this measure it provides that labor organizations must register with the National Labor Relations Board and give detailed information with respect to initiation fees, dues, assessments, number of members, last election of officers, financial transactions, and so forth. It will also make it unlawful for unions to contribute to political campaign funds. Any union violating the provisions of the bill would be denied all the benefits conferred by the Wagner Labor Act.

I have been a paying member of the typographical union for nearly 30 years. That union is distinctive because it rarely has a strike and always lives up to its contractual obligations. It is the one union in America that is truly democratic and representative because it is ruled by its membership rather than by a few insiders who operate for their own personal gains.

I firmly believe that the history of the typographical union furnishes a foundation upon which we may build labor legislation that will protect the interests of the worker, the employer, and the public.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I desire to incorporate in my remarks a very timely article on the typographical union by William Hard which appeared in the June issue of Reader's Digest. The article follows:

THE TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—MODEL FOR ALL

(By William Hard)

In previous articles I have urged that all unions be required by law to hold regular elections, to make regular financial reports, to get a majority vote of rank-and-file members before striking or picketing, and—in short—to operate democratically.

It has been alleged that such laws would cripple the unions. So now I write about the typographical union, the printers' union.

The typographical union is the oldest union in America. Its local branch in Washington, D. C., was founded in 1815. Its local in New York City was founded in 1850 by Horace Greeley. In 1852 these and other locals merged to make the national union, which now has its headquarters in Indianapolis. Today this union has almost 900 locals and more than 80,000 members. In towns of 7,000 and above, it sets the type for over 85 percent of all newspapers and printing establishments.

Clearly it has been successful for itself. It also has been successful for its members.

Print shops used to be dark and dirty; the air in them was foul; the workday was 12 hours; tuberculosis was an accepted printer's ailment; the average age of printers at death was 28.

The union made up its mind to lift that age. All locals of the union formed committees on sanitation, which pleaded with employers and health authorities, and pushed print shops into the forefront of early industrial sanitary progress. Then, in 1892, the union established the Union Printers' Home at Colorado Springs—a sanatorium for tuberculous members and a place of retirement for aged ones. The union has spent more than $9,000,000 on it.

Above all, the union has reduced the workday. Work in a modern composing room is fast, intense, exhausting. The union has gradually brought the worktime of its members down from 12 hours a day to a maximum of 40 hours a week—except for war needs and other emergencies.

The consequence to the lives of its members cannot be a mere coincidence. Their average age at death has been lifted from 28 to the following levels:

By 1900, to 41; by 1910, to 46; by 1920, to 53; by 1930, to 59; by 1942, to 64.

This union has served life. Its success is unquestionable. So, next: Has it won this success by dictatorship over its members and class war against its employers?

It has not. Among its 900 locals there have been plenty of instances of hotheadedness and unreasonableness. The main point nevertheless remains that the typographical union, so old, so successful, is utterly antidictatorship and utterly anticlass war. Let us look at its methods from the bottom up.

You start toward being a member of the typographical union by becoming an apprentice. You can become an apprentice at 16. Then for six years you study your trade by practice in the shop and by taking 149 printed lessons sent to you by the union's bureau of education. These lessons are so complete that they have been adopted by many school systems as official textbooks.

A special set of lessons tells you about unionism. You are taught to remember the 19 London Times printers who in the early nineteenth century were sent to jail for trying to have a union. You are taught that union men must sacrifice for each other in order to continue to have a union. You are taught that it will be your duty to attend union meetings and to vote on all union problems.

But you are also taught about employers. You are taught that labor should not be unfriendly to capital; that capital and labor both are essential to efficient and economical production; that the union should insure high-class workmanship; that it should strive to reduce unit costs; that the employers of the typographical union have virtually never broken a contract with the union, and that no local should ever break a contract with any employer; that every local should regard itself as a partner with the employer in the production process; that every preacher of class war, every Communist, every Fascist, every Nazi, is an enemy to the union and should be eliminated from the whole American labor movement.

On all these lessons the apprentice must pass examinations. Then he is a journeyman and a full member of the union and starts voting. He spends lots of his time voting.

The typographical union insists that its locals shall manage their own local affairs. Some unions get themselves centralized into their national headquarters. Their national officers become national despots. They found dynasties. The typographical union nourishes democracy's taproot—local self-government.

Every typographical union local must hold a regular monthly meeting on a regular stated day. It must elect an auditing committee or employ a certified public accountant to examine the books of its officers every 3 months. It must vote on every contract with an employer; and the contract binds every member. It must conduct a referendum of all its members and get a majority before it can raise its dues. It must vote on any proposed strike and get a three-quarters majority before striking.

In these circumstances no one-man rule is possible. And if this union can prevent the birth of labor bosses, all unions can.

Unions normally choose their national officers in a convention of elected delegates. That's democratic enough for most of us. But the members of the typographical union nominate and elect their national officers themselves in a Nation-wide referendum. It happens every 2 years. It is one of the most instructive events under the American democratic sky.

Members who aspire to be candidates must announce themselves in four lines of 6-point type, one column wide, in the December and January issues of the Typographical Journal, the union's paper mailed to every member. The Journal has to print the announcements of all aspirants to national offices whether the existing officers like them or not. They often do not.

The union, being American and democratic, just naturally has the two-party system. One party is called the Independents, the other the Progressives. Each gets its issues by watching the other and pouncing upon it for the general welfare, just like Republicans and Democrats. And, just as where are men known as national Democratic or Republican leaders, so there are union-wide Progressive and Independent leaders.

In February the locals nominate. Each may name one man for each national office. A local with a majority of Independents will vote for a nationally known Independent. Another local will vote for a Progressive leader. In the case of each national office, the five men nominated by the largest number of locals become the Nation-wide candidates. Often, however, it turns out that all the Progressive locals have voted for one man, and all the Independent locals for another, so that only two men run in the final election.

The names of the nominees are printed in the Journal in April. Each nominee may state his qualifications in the Journal—up to 200 words' worth of them.

On the third Wednesday in May the locals vote by secret ballot. The sealed ballots are forwarded to Indianapolis, where, on May 31, while watchers from both parties watch, they are opened and totaled; and the victors are proclaimed. The process has taken 6 months; but it is absolutely stealproof.

And if this union can operate stealproof elections, all unions can. The coercion and fraud that so often occur in union elections are not necessary to a strong and energetic labor movement.

Now, let us look at some more referendum democracy in the typographical union. In 1937 Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, sent the union a letter. It said that an American Federation of Labor convention had ordered the union to pay to the American Federation of Labor a new assessment of 1 cent per member per month. The typographical union was shocked to its foundations.

The union has an annual convention of its own. This convention does a lot of important enacting of general laws and bylaws for the whole union. But there are two things it cannot do. It cannot by itself amend the union's constitution. And it cannot by itself levy a new tax upon the members. Both those things have to go to a referendum vote of the entire membership.

When the members of the typographical union thought of an American Federation of Labor convention trying to do to them in taxation what not even their own convention could do, they went "white hot." They yelled "Dictatorship!" and they rushed to a referendum. They voted 4 to 1 to decline to pay the new American Federation of Labor assessment.

The typographical union in the early 1880's was the main force in the founding of the American Federation of Labor. Now it is independent, belonging neither to the American Federation of Labor nor to the Congress of Industrial Organizations. At its 1942 convention it adopted a resolution saying that it would like to unite itself with a reunited American labor movement—but only on one condition, namely: "The establishment of democratic procedures in all affiliated unions."

And it came near adding another condition, namely: "The elimination of gangsterism and the barring from office of all associates of underworld characters in all affiliated unions."

I ask, Is the typographical union anti-union because it charges that undemocratic procedures exist in unions?

I suggest that this country is equally tired of business leaders who cry "antibusiness" to stop business reforms and of union leaders who cry "antiunion" to stop union reforms.

Now, let us look at the typographical union's funds. On this point our unions are often unfairly attacked. People say:

"Look at all their money, taken off poor working people!"

It is a foolish remark till we know what the money was spent for.

The national organization of the Typographical Union, in its last fiscal year, collected more than $4,000,000 from its members, which is about $1 a week per member. It's a lot. But the union spent more than $400,000 on the Union Printers' Home, and almost $3,000,000 on pensions for old members. It spent $500,000 on funeral benefits and continued to be able to say, "No union printer ever filled a pauper's grave." It spent $100,000 on the Typographical Journal. Its expenses for all its elected officers and employed organizers, for all their traveling expenses and for all other services, and they were many, amounted to less than $200,000. It works out to less than 5 cents per member per week. No corporation does a tighter job of economy.

Claude Baker, president, and Woodruff Randolph, secretary-treasurer, get $7,500 a year. How many businesses with an annual turn-over of more than $4,000,000 pay less to their top men?

But how do I know that the union accounts are straight? Because they are checked twice a year by a committee of three auditors elected by the total membership of the union; and because they are additionally checked twice a year by certified public accountants; and because they are printed every month in page after page of the Typographical Journal.

Many other unions come equally clean. Therefore all can and should and must.

A democratic union has two advantages for the country. The first is that it tends toward relations with employers that are more human and intelligent and stable. But the second is even more important.

The whole democratic world, in order to meet the competition of the totalitarian world, has to perfect its own democratic institutions. It has to democratize its daily business life and its daily labor life. You cannot live an undemocratic life 364 days in the year and then achieve democracy by going to a political polling place on the 365th.

If you visit a union composing room, you may see the compositors, in a lull of work, gathered into a quick huddle. They are holding a meeting of their chapel—a subdivision of their local. They are rapidly settling, among themselves, some point of shop technique or shop discipline.

These little cells represent daily, hourly practice in democratic living. They represent participation in economic government. They represent economic government by consent. They train men to detest autocracy and to desire democracy in all things.

Freedom needs such men. Free democratic business must learn that in order to survive against the totalitarian state it has to have such men. The final merit of the typographical union is that its institutions are organized to produce such men.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important bill and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentlewoman will not insist upon the point of order. The Committee is practically ready to rise and I want to yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], whose views concur with those held by the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from New Jersey withdraws the point of order.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I heard with interest some of the figures and statements given by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] as to the loss of man-hours resulting from strikes, and I would like to counter by calling the attention of the Members to a very brilliant statement made by Hon. James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization and former distinguished Member of this body, the other night over the radio on the subject, wherein he said:

> Do not forget during 1942 only one-twentieth of 1 percent of time of workers engaged in war work was lost on strike. A striker in a war industry is almost as rare as a slacker in the Army.

I have read carefully this bill, read it from stem to stern. To my mind it is a very obnoxious measure, in these parlous times particularly. I would call it a "scab's charter," particularly since it has the effect of reviving and re-creating the vile and loathsome "yellow dog" contracts, and it also reinstitutes domination of labor by court injunctions.

Both Democratic and Republican Parties repeatedly in their platforms denounced rule by labor injunctions, and they illustrated the most intolerable conditions that were brought about by labor injunctions. Now we would revive all that; a section of the bill provides for the revival of that vilest weapon that has ever been used in the past against labor.

We are again to have the "yellow dog" contracts. This bill will strafe labor, to borrow a World War term.

I believe we are revenging in haste by this bill what we are going to repent at our leisure.

Everywhere you hear words denunciatory of John L. Lewis, but why visit the sins of Mr. Lewis upon the rank and file of labor? Why give vent to your spleen with reference to Mr. Lewis and thereby do all in your power to hurt not only him but labor everywhere, and, besides, to foment and encourage unrest among the ranks of labor.

Section 2 of this bill denies the minority the right to strike. For example, 499 men of a plant of 1,000, under repeated Supreme Court decisions, have the individual right to agree one with the other to strike. But this bill, through section 2, denies the right to a minority to strike. That is an inalienable right, because the right to strike has been held to be not only an individual but a collective right. It involves the right of free speech, the right of free press, and the right of peaceful assembly. Nothing should prevent a group of men in a plant, even if they be the minority, to gather together peacefully and freely express their desires and wishes to better their conditions, and, if they are not bettered, they have a right to urge their fellows to strike.

But, under the cloak and cover of war, that right is to be taken away. Labor is to be curbed into submission.

While labor is engaged in turning out a plethora of tanks, planes, guns, and ships, it is to be stabbed in the back. That is ill reward for labor's purpose voluntarily to ban strikes. I have just read to you the statement of Mobilization Director Byrnes, praising labor and its great contribution to our war effort.

I cannot touch upon all the obnoxious provisions of this bill. One of them is involved in section 5–A. This outlaws the boycott and sympathy strikes. It withdraws the right of the workers to refuse to work on "unfair materials." That right should be suspended in war times. It has been suspended by voluntary agreement. There is no need to suspend it by legislative flat. It is an insult to labor to do so. By judicial interpretation, it is no longer a violation of the Sherman law, or any other law, to refuse to work upon unfair goods. In this regard, I quote the late Mr. Justice Brandeis, who, together with the late Mr. Justice Holmes, said:

> If on the undisputed facts of this case refusal to work can be enjoined, Congress created by the Sherman law and the Clayton Act an instrument for imposing restraints upon labor which reminds of involuntary servitude.

The decision referred to has since gone into the limbo of over-ruled cases, and the right to strike for the purpose of defending the integrity of a trade union organization has never since been successfully challenged.

This section 5–A to my mind has no connection whatsoever with the war effort. If a war contractor is on an unfair list and has customers who are employers who are in turn in no way involved in defense, unions cannot, under section 5–A strike, picket, or boycott such customers.

This is so, despite the unfair conditions obtaining in such employer-customers' shops or plants. This is so despite the unfair goods handled by such employer-customers, which goods the man in the shop of the war contractor may have to use or fabricate or handle.

There is no conceivable connection between section 5–A and the defense program. The purpose is simply to strike down labor's basic constitutional right to boycott, to strike and to refuse to use "unfair materials."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do not rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 796) relating to the use and operation by the United States of certain plants in the interests of the national defense, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the amendments which were agreed to and adopted by the House Military Affairs Committee on today, which will be offered tomorrow to the pending bill, for the information of the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The amendments referred to follow:

On page 8, line 22, after the word "which", strike the words "may be" and insert the word "are." Line 23, after the word "which", strike the words "may be" and insert the word "are."

When possession of any plant, mine, or other property has been, or is hereafter taken by the Government under authority of section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, or otherwise, by reason of a strike, lock-out, threatened strike, threatened lock-out, work stoppage, or other cause, such plant, mine, or other property shall be returned to the owners thereof as soon as practicable but in no event more than 60 days after the termination of the conditions which caused possession of such plant, mine, or other property to be so taken."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on two subjects and to include therein certain statements and excerpts, and a copy of a bill.

TREASURY-POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1944

Mr. LUDLOW submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 1648) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] may extend his own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a brief article from the Nation's Week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I was granted a special order to address the House today. I now ask, in lieu thereof, that I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on tomorrow, Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY] is recognized for 25 minutes.

THE SMITH-CONNALLY BILL

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, in the following 25 minutes, during which time I have been privileged to address the Members of this distinguished body, I would like to point out why, in my humble opinion, the House should not adopt the provisions of the Smith-Connally bill. The House of Representatives has been referred to repeatedly as the greatest deliberative body in the world. Deliberation as defined by Webster is:

> Done or offered with deliberation * * * formed, arrived at, or determined upon as a result of careful thought and weighing of considerations; as deliberate judgment or plan; carried on coolly and steadily.

2. Given to weighing facts and arguments with a view to choice or decision; careful in considering the consequences of a step; circumspect * * * characterized by reflection; dispassionate—not rash.

Certainly in a matter of such grave importance, it is not a time to rely upon emotional appeal or an appeal to passion but to consider the question from the standpoint of a cold factual analysis.

On December 1, 1941, there was introduced in the Senate a bill, No. 2054, relating to the use and operation by the United States of certain plants in the interest of the national defense. That bill did not pass in the Seventy-seventh Congress. Recently the provisions of that bill were reintroduced in Senate bill 796. Senate bill 796, originally known as the Connally bill, provided in substance for Government seizure of plants in which a strike had developed and criminal penalty for any activity which might provoke or cause a strike after seizure. Without hearings the bill was brought on the floor of the Senate in the heat and hurry of the critical situation which then appeared to be developing with respect to the coal mines. On the floor of the Senate, and during the course of debate, a substantially new bill was written and passed containing provisions which went far beyond the original Connally bill and covered operations of the National War Labor Board generally, including a provision which apparently called for and permitted dilatory court review of Board decisions.

When the bill reached the House, the Military Affairs Committee, still without hearing—and in fact refusing to accede to the pleas of the labor organizations and many others for the opportunity to discuss the bill—simply and literally struck out the entire bill as passed by the Senate, and inserted a complete new bill of its own. This new bill substantially embodied most of the factors of the so-called Smith bill of 1941. It is for this reason that in its present version the measure is generally referred to as the Connally-Smith bill.

The Connally bill considered by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate was in effect an amendment of section 9 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940. In the House, because of the military aspects of the bill, it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and not to the Labor Committee.

It is fair to assume, therefore, that the problem is not primarily one of labor but something connected with the military. That being so, it is necessary first to consider—how will the bill aid in the war effort?—will it provide an improvement over present methods in helping to win the war at the earliest possible date? Military authorities feel and the record discloses facts which justify the assertion that we are making great strides under the present set-up. May I call your attention to the testimony of some distinguished military witnesses?

One of the first acts of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, the American commanding general of all Allied forces in the African theater, following the Tunisian victory, was to dispatch the following message across the Atlantic Ocean:

Our fighting men, standing shoulder to shoulder with our gallant allies, the British and the French, have driven the enemy out of north Africa. In this victory the munitions made by American industry—labor and management—played a very important role. There is glory for us all in this achievement.

Hon. James V. Forrestal, Under Secretary of the Navy, had this to say:

Hitler and Tojo disrupt, convert, and create industries as expediency dictates. They possess complete power over their war production and exercise that power ruthlessly. Such methods are not for America. Such tactics are completely antipathetic to the very principles for which we are fighting. In this country a tremendous reorganization and rededication of industry is taking place, but it is on a basis of voluntary cooperation. Management and labor alike are putting their shoulders to the wheel, freemen banded together in the common cause of human liberty.

Lt. Gen. William S. Knudsen, Director of Production, War Department, said inter alia:

We are all part of this effort to win the war. Our combined efforts will show the enemy that free labor and free enterprise can lick any combination of slavery and fear. We have the resources; we have the men; and we have the will to win. This is your United States and my United States—united as never before.

Rear Admiral C. H. Woodward, United States Navy, retired, Chief of the Incentive Division, Navy Department, in referring to Pearl Harbor said inter alia:

The fact is that many of these civilian workers had themselves been under fire in that treacherous attack and had courageously joined the Navy and Marine Corps in manning guns that defended the harbor. Undismayed and undaunted, they subsequently resumed their duties with even greater zeal and devotion. And despite almost insurmountable difficulties, their production achievements during the next 9 months were so outstanding that they won for themselves the high distinction of the Army-Navy E—symbol of excellence in production.

That indomitable spirit, manifested in a thousand ways by both labor and management in their relations with the Navy since the beginning of the world crisis, is immeasurably speeding the gigantic task we have before us. It is not only bringing ever closer to realization America's multi-ocean Navy of the future, but is laying, securely and inexorably, the foundations for the smashing victory over the forces of aggression which we are consecrated to win.

Today the Navy is the largest single employer in the country, if not in the world.

And again:

In meeting this mighty production problem, rendered doubly grave because in our struggle we are facing enemies who have been frantically arming for years while we were busily beating our swords into ploughshares, the Navy sought to enlist every hand and brain, every ounce of energy, every bit of skill and ingenuity that free American labor and free American enterprise could muster. It has not sought in vain. The response from both management and labor, organized and unorganized, has been little short of magnificent.

But even more inspiring has been the unity, the feeling of comradeship that has animated these soldiers of production and the personnel of the Navy in their common task of transforming our enormous industrial organization and potentials into an arsenal for the tools of victory. Never has practical democracy been more dynamic or efficient. If any more proof were required that for us the American way of life is the only way of life, this most perilous period of our national existence has supplied it beyond quibble or dispute.

The Navy Department itself accurately characterized this prevailing spirit of understanding and cooperation when it declared publicly not long ago: "The aims, ambitions, plans, and hopes of the Navy are identical with those of the vast majority of men and women who work for the Navy, and its employees are engaged and joined in a common cause and a common objective.'

This ccoperation and teamwork is a prerequisite of total war, which is in essence war on two fronts—the fighting line and the production line. The strategy of this type of warfare is simple: Produce—and attack! The side that produces matériel faster, and with this advantage of fire power attacks sooner, wins the day.

While management, in these and other ways, enlisted its resources in the Navy's gigantic program, labor rose to the occasion no less quickly and patriotically and assumed new responsibilities in our victory drive.

Even before Pearl Harbor labor had demonstrated its fighting spirit when it pitched in and repaired in 5 days the damage done by fire to a $2,250,000 defense plant at Cleveland, Ohio. It rushed construction of the immense naval base at Corpus Christi, Tex., to completion far ahead of schedule and smashed building records in putting up defense housing.

Upon our entrance into the war labor voluntarily discarded its time-honored right to strike, and the score since then is 2,000 strikes prevented for each one that has occurred. Labor is trying manfully to eliminate even this small fraction of work stoppages.

Unions affiliated with the Congress of Industrial Organizations and the American Federation of Labor have of their own initiative waived double-time rates for holidays and Sunday work in all continuously operating war industries. The building trades unions have done this in the stabilization pact with the Government and war contractors. The metal-trades unions have done the same thing in the shipyards.

Despite the overtime provisions of the 40-hour week law, 7 out of 10 workers are now putting in 48 to 60 hours per week. In the machine-tool industry labor is working from 50 to 70 hours a week; in most aircraft factories 44 to 54 hours weekly; and nearly 70 percent of the Nation's shipyard workers are on their jobs from 46 to 52 hours a week.

In the production of ships, steel, machine tools, and other materials labor is setting new records regularly, only to smash these records in short order. In everything, from driving rivets and welding seams to laying wartime oil pipe lines and building naval barracks, labor has exceeded any previous standards of accomplishment.

The battleship Alabama was completed 9 months ahead of schedule. The mighty Iowa hit the water 7 months in advance of the contract date. The greatest mass launching in history was staged by the shipbuilders of America last Labor Day, when no less than 174 naval and merchant vessels were launched in 60 different yards throughout the United States. The keels for 49 ships were laid the same day in these same yards. The achievement gained additional luster from the fact that many workers donated their Labor Day wages as contributions toward the purchase of bombers, new ships, and more arms for our fighting forces, and toward Navy relief.

In other ways labor has shown itself equally generous with its money as with its skill and sinews, notably when American Federation of Labor building-trades members recently presented to the Navy a new $62,000 archives building for storing microfilms—1 of 10 buildings contributed by the group to the war effort with wages earned on extra days and holidays.

In recognition of the splendid service of both labor and management the Navy instituted the Navy E award for presentation to plants that demonstrated their excellence in producing ships, weapons, and equipment for the Navy. A total of 221 plants were so honored, with the privilege of flying the Navy E burgee at their mastheads. The present Army-Navy production award was inaugurated in order that all our fighting forces could join in paying tribute to exceptional performance on the production line. Thus far, the Army-Navy production award has been made to 200 plants which are producing for the Navy. Over each of these plants flies the red and blue pennant with its wreath of oak and laurel leaves; and each individual employee wears the distinctive silver E pin as a badge of meritorious service to his country.

An honor not lightly bestowed, the E floating above a plant means that the workers in that building have earned their award with the same caliber of efficiency, skill, and loyalty as the sailors of the warships that in times past won the right to display the identical symbol on their turrets or conning towers.

It means: "Well done to all hands."

Hon. Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy, made a comment, which is pertinent, as follows:

I wish with all my heart that we could likewise increase the quality of criticism. We have had a greater overproduction in fault finding than in any other product of American ingenuity. If all the profligate outpouring of good paper, ink, and breath could be refined to sound, useful, critical analysis, from which the men charged with the management of war effort could profit, Hitler and his stooges in Tokyo and Rome would know their ultimate doom to be closer.

Today, on the floor of the House, we were treated to the very interesting spectacle of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs speaking with great zeal, with great emotion, and with great feeling, about labor taking 30 days to cool off. It seems to me that a poem I learned when I was but a youngster is appropriate at this stage of the proceedings:

In speaking of another's faults
Pray don't forget your own,
Remember those in homes of glass
Should seldom throw a stone.

When we have nothing else to do
But speak of those who sin,
'Tis better we commence at home
And from that point begin.

I'll tell you of a better plan,
I find it works quite well—
To try my own defects to cure
Before of others, tell.

Then let us all, when we commence
To slander friend or foe,
Think of the harm one word may do
To others we little know.

Remember that our troubles
Sometimes like our chickens roost at home;
So do not speak of others' faults
Until you have none of your own.

FROM THE STANDPOINT OF OBJECTIONS TO THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONNALLY-SMITH BILL

I could go on and quote in the RECORD the objections of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, the objections of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union, the objections of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, the objections of the United Rubber Workers of America, the objections of the Congress of Industrial Organizations—which have been prepared and outlined at length—and the objections of the American Federation of Labor.

At this point I should like also, referring to my little bit of poetry, to refer to the statement made on the floor by he distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH]. He said that in 1942 we had more strikes than at any other time except 2 years in the preceding 20 years. Let me quote the facts from the record. In the Monthly Labor Review of May 1943 will be found the following, and I quote verbatim from page 959:

There was a substantial decline in strike activity in 1942, the first full year of the country's participation in World War No. 2. During the year there were 2,968 strikes, involving approximately 840,000 workers, and 4,183,000 man-days of idleness. About 28 workers out of 1,000 employed were involved in a strike at some time during the year; idleness during strikes is estimated to be a twentieth of 1 percent of the time worked.

And again:

Viewed against the strike record of the last decade, 1942 stands as a year of slightly more than the average number of strikes but less than the average number of workers involved, and substantially less idleness than in any other year. Except for 1930, there was less strike idleness in 1942 than any year for which information is available.

I say that is exactly contrary to what the distinguished citizen of Virginia said on the floor of this House.

Again, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia talked about having the polls to tell what public opinion in America was. I should like to call his attention and the attention of the House to another poll, not that I care too much about polls, but this is one in a recent issue of Fortune Magazine, that for June 1943, appearing at page 224:

A few weeks before John L. Lewis called labor to arms against the President's domestic war program, 56 percent of the American people marked Roosevelt's job on home problems "good." Their judgment on Congress, elected by the same people less than a year ago, was considerably harsher, 26 percent good, 17 percent poor. Worse, if faced with a choice between a peace plan of Roosevelt's making and one planned by the present Congress, 58 percent would take the President's advice, only 28 percent would endorse Congress.

It seems to me, in view of the attitude of the heads of the departments who are running the war, that this bill should be defeated. As a Member of this distinguished body, I resented a Member of this Congress referring on this floor to the department heads, the people responsible for the conduct of the war, and saying that something was "cooked up"—to use the distinguished Member's expression—in the Department of Labor, when the representatives of the Navy and Army and the W. P. B., the War Labor Board, and the National Labor Relations Board prepared a statement to say to this Congress that they felt that this particular bill was not wise in its provisions.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FENTON. I may add to what the gentleman has said that those very same department people, the representatives of the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War and the Maritime Commission, distinctly said yesterday, just yesterday, that they would adhere strictly to the letter that they wrote on May 15 against this bill, and that they believed as of yesterday it is still a mistake to have this bill passed.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

At this point in the RECORD I call the attention of the Members of this distinguished body to this so-called reference to the voice of the people and what the country has to say about it. If 56 percent, at least, of the American people marked Roosevelt's job on the home problems "good," and I say that is a small percentage, that the percentage of public approval is larger, why should not we in preparing legislation follow the leadership and advice of those responsible for the war effort?

Once again, I should like to call the attention of the Members to the address of the Honorable James Byrnes on America's entrance into the critical phase of the war, in which he outlines, step after step, the great contribution made by American labor in this war effort.

Now, to refer particularly to the sections of the bill, I should like to place in the RECORD the following:

ANALYSIS OF AND COMMENTS ON SMITH-CONNALLY BILL, S. 796, BY THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

The bill is a hodgepodge of antilabor measures, many of which have no relationship whatsoever to the war effort. The bill tramples upon and violates almost every right which labor has gained after years of struggle. It is a bitter reward for the contributions that labor has made to the present war effort whereunder seemingly impossible production records have been achieved. No greater or more unmerited blow to the morale of millions of patriotic American workers can be conceived than that inflicted by the present bill. The bill will inevitably interfere with war production and stimulate industrial unrest, and the effectiveness of existing machinery for the orderly settlement of labor disputes will be impaired if not destroyed.

The report accompanying the bill states that the legislation is necessary because of the crisis in the coal mines. Aside from the fact that the Government has taken appropriate action and now operates the mines, the provisions of the bill are not limited to the coal industry but apply to every plant producing materials needed in or helpful to the war effort, and apply to millions of American workers in addition to the comparatively few working in the coal mines. Compulsory legislation prohibiting strikes is not necessary to achieve maximum production. Existing voluntary procedures have not only proved sufficient but have operated to make possible the greatest production record in the history of this or any other country. Organized labor has lived up to its "no-strike" pledge to the fullest possible extent, and even those few unauthorized stoppages which have occurred have caused a total man-days loss of only a fraction of that occurring in time of peace, and is less than half of that occurring in Great Britain. Time and again our war leaders and production heads, in praising the production achievements of organized labor, have declared that the time which has been lost was unavoidable, and that labor has fulfilled its no-strike obligation to the fullest extent humanly possible. The production records speak for themselves in this respect. The passage of this bill would constitute an absolutely unwarranted reflection upon millions of American workers and would impugn the patriotism of millions of union members whose brothers, sons, and fathers are on our fighting fronts.

Let us analyze some of the provisions of the bill.

In that connection I direct the attention of the members to the recent publication of the War Production Board, page 10, in which it shows the part of labor in this war, and I challenge anyone to show that that has not been to say the least, excellent.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think it is very significant that the people who are propelling this legislation through this House at this time are identically the same individuals speaking for and representing the same anti-labor interests who have always been opposed to labor, and who have always sought to undermine the American foundation of freedom upon which American labor unions rest.

Mr. MURPHY. I thank the gentleman.

Section 2 prohibits strikes for a 30-day cooling-off period. Organized labor has already voluntarily given up the right to strike and has lived up to its pledge in this respect, which in itself makes such a provision unnecessary.

Section 3 of the bill requires a majority vote to engage in a strike after the 30-day cooling-off period. Such a provision reflects directly and unwarrantedly on the integrity and responsibility of the many thousands of union leaders throughout the country. Unions, by their own elections, themselves repose responsibility in their officers to determine the policy and conduct the affairs of the membership. However, the most important objection to this provision is the fact that it denies to minorities their moral and legal rights to quit in concert and declare their grievances to the world. The mere fact that only 450 of a thousand employees are agreed upon a strike and agreed upon the grievances that give rise to the strike is no reason to deny them their rights because 550 think otherwise. The right of a minority to strike is not dependent upon the will of a majority; it is not equivalent to elections to office. The right to strike, like all basic constitutional rights, is an individual and collective right not subject to dictates by any group, majority or otherwise. It is protected by the Constitution in the same manner as religious worship, freedom of speech, peaceable assembly, and similar rights.

Section 4 (a) forbids force or violence in connection with a labor dispute in a war plant. This, of course, is entirely unnecessary since force or violence is nowhere lawful in the United States. Its necessary result is for antilabor employers to encourage violence on the picket line through the use of professional provocateurs and thus deprive workers of their rights under the Wagner Act.

Section 4 (b) prohibits peaceful picketing before a "house or place where a person resides." This is clearly in violation of the first amendment which prevents Congress from the passing of law abridging freedom of speech and of assembly.

Section 4 (c) prohibits any but so-called bona fide employees from engaging in peaceful picketing. This is a direct throwback to the reactionary days where labor disputes were in effect limited to disputes between an employer and his immediate employees. In other words this section prohibits so-called "stranger picketing" and is in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States for the same reasons as noted above. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent case of American Federation of Labor v. Swing, said that "A State cannot exclude workingmen from peacefully exercising the rights of free communication by drawing the circle of economic competition between employers and workers so small as to contain only an employer and those directly employed by him. The interdependence of economic interest of all engaged in the same industry has become a commonplace."

Section 5 (a) outlaws the boycott. Unions may not strike any person—regardless of whether or not he be a defense contractor—or refuse to work on or handle the products of such person in an effort to induce a defense contractor to deal with the union. Thus, if a defense contractor be on the unfair list and has among his customers employers who are in no way involved in the defense program, the union, nevertheless, may not strike or picket such customer. There is no conceivable connection between this provision and the defense program. The purpose of this provision, too, is primarily to reduce labor's basic constitutional rights.

Section 5 (b) prohibits strikes and other concerted activities on the part of unions against a defense contractor calculated to displace another union that has a collective bargaining agreement. While this provision is undoubtedly aimed at jurisdictional and inter-union disputes, it would also by its terms tend to freeze collective bargaining relationships between the employers and company unions and to restrict freedom of choice of employees under existing contracts.

Section 6 deals with enforcement. 6 (a) amends the Norris-LaGuardia Act so as to permit ex parte injunctions for violation of any of the preceding sections. Thus, the dictatorial rule of government by injunction is revived in a purported national effort to fight dictatorships. Section 6 (b) adds to the penalties by permitting civil actions for damages by employers for violation of the preceding sections. Here is revealed the true spirit and purpose of this bill, namely, to weaken and destroy labor unions. It can superficially be argued that the prevention of strikes is necessary as an emergency measure in order to avoid interruptions in defense production. But surely, there is no connection between the continuous flow of defense production and enriching employers by giving them private suits wherewith they will seek to delete union treasuries.

But that is not all. Section 6 (c) imposes additional penalties on individuals who are found to have violated the preceding sections. First, an employee loses his status as an employee or as a representative under the Wagner Act. Second, employees lose all benefits under "any act making appropriations for relief purposes;" and third, section 6 (d) completes the picture by providing that, if any individual violating the preceding sections is an officer or representative of a labor organization, then the organization itself loses its status under the Wagner Act and under the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Section 7 deals with compulsory registration of all labor organizations with the National Labor Relations Board. It requires filing information on almost every detail of internal union affairs. Failure to comply disqualifies the labor organization to act as collective bargaining agent.

It should be noted that in England registration of labor organizations is entirely voluntary and carries with it certain stated benefits. This provision, which can only remotely be connected with the national defense program, does not, of course, extend any benefits to labor organizations and makes it compulsory for them to register. From the tenor of the entire bill, as well as the spirit of those who sponsor and favor it, it is fair to say that the direct aim of these provisions is to accumulate sufficient data about labor organizations so as to facilitate procedures for destroying these labor organizations.

No other voluntary trade association, such as the National Association of Manufacturers, chambers of commerce, or employer associations are required to register and disclose their internal affairs. If such legislation is proper, then it is likewise proper to require the disclosure of the internal affairs of all clubs, societies, mutual-benefit associations, or any other type of voluntary association.

Sections 8 and 9 give the War Labor Board authority to hear and determine labor disputes affecting the war effort, but it is provided that the Board cannot direct that a closed- or union-shop clause be incorporated in any labor agreement directed by it. Labor has not asked the Government to compel the union or closed shop; the Government should not seek to compel a compulsory open shop. The matter is one which should be left to the discretion of the War Labor Board, dependent upon the facts of each particular case. Under this provision, upon the expiration of existing union-shop agreements, employers may refuse to renew them, and labor, under its no-strike pledge, would have no way of maintaining the security which perhaps had been won only after long struggles. Is it equitable to permit any company to take advantage of the no-strike agreement to throw out a union shop previously established by agreements between the parties? In the Harvill Aircraft Die Casting Corporation case the War Labor Board determined that "likewise, to push union shops back into open shops would unstabilize, for war production, the unions of the millions of American workers who have pledged themselves not to strike but to leave to peaceful arbitrament the security of the unions which they have won after long and arduous struggles."

Section 10 empowers the War Labor Board to prohibit strikes in any plant in which a dispute has arisen, and the prohibition on striking can last as long as 60 days. The order is enforceable by injunctive decree obtained by the Attorney General in the Federal courts, and the Norris-LaGuardia Act is amended to permit courts to issue labor injunctions. This section is objectionable for the same reason that section 2, providing for a "cooling off" period, is objectionable; it constitutes involuntary servitude and is entirely unnecessary in view of the no-strike pledge.

Under section 13 of the bill, it is made a crime punishable by heavy fine or a year's imprisonment, or both, for any person "to instigate or induce any interference or other interruption" with a plant taken over by the Government. Any just protest against intolerable conditions voiced by one worker to another, let alone to an assemblage of his fellow workers, could be classified as an "inducement" or an "instigation" or an "interference" with the operation of a business. It matters not whether such worker be union official, union member, or neither; indeed, if a protest is made by a union representative upon request of workers whom he was chosen to represent, the crime presumably would be conclusive. Under this section not only is a condition of involuntary servitude imposed but, even worse, persons who already have had their right to a strike outlawed would be hazarding their liberties by making any protests or by taking any concerted action against any grievance, no matter how great the provocation. Surely, personal liberty and liberty of speech is what we are fighting to preserve, not destroy.

Subsection a (2) of section 13 makes it a crime for any person to aid an interruption by giving direction or guidance or providing funds. Under this section an international union could maintain ordinary correspondence or intercourse with an affiliated local that might be involved in a work interruption at a Government-operated plant only at its peril, and the payment of ordinary salaries as required by constitutional provisions in such cases might well constitute a crime.

It is no comfort to provide in section 13 that an individual shall have the right to cease work when that individual is forbidden to discuss lawful grievances with a fellow worker or workers and quit employment in concert with him or them. This proviso merely restores the ancient doctrine of conspiracy under which organized labor, early in its history, suffered so much abuse at the hands of the courts.

The Smith-Connally bill is wrong in principle, is entirely lacking in necessity, is unjust in application, and constitutes a gratuitous insult to millions of American workers who are expending every effort on the production fronts. At very best, as stated by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, the provisions of the bill "constitute a club—a vengeful weapon aimed at all American workers in retaliation for the acts of a few. American workers will not and cannot subject themselves to such tyranny. This measure, if enacted into law, will wreck the war production program. It will wipe out the vast benefits that have been derived from the operation of labor's voluntary no-strike pledge. It will be as unenforceable as prohibition. How can American workers join wholeheartedly in a war for the preservation of freedom when their own freedoms are being cut out from under them? How can American workers believe in the sincerity of America's war against fascism, when Fascist legislation is being imposed against them?"

If any person believes that war production would be increased by passage of the bill, or that the morale of the American worker would thereby be raised, he is seriously mistaken. Not only is the voice of 12,000,000 organized workers raised against passage of this bill, but the leaders of our war program both on the military and production front and the heads of all governmental agencies and tribunals dealing with labor relations have unanimously condemned the bill as constituting an interference with the war effort and have requested and urged the Members of Congress to vote against its passage. In a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House, the chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs and the majority leader of the House, and signed by the War Department, the Navy Department, the Labor Department, the Maritime Commission, the War Production Board, the National Labor Relations Board, and the National War Labor Board, it was stated that "The committee bill proposes drastic and far-reaching changes in the over-all machinery and principles established by statute, Executive order, and mutual agreement for dealing with labor relations in the war period. According to the committee report, these changes are imperative because of the emergency which may arise from the current dispute in the coal industry. But the bill in its terms is not limited to that industry and therefore must be appraised with respect to its impact upon the whole field of industrial production. While recognizing the gravity of the coal-mining situation, and without attempting to suggest here what specific steps should be taken in dealing with that situation, we note that since the Government has taken possession of the coal mines, only a few sections of the bill have any bearing upon that particular dispute. The bill relates to American industry generally and to the whole problem of maintaining industrial peace in time of war. It is accordingly felt that in evaluating the bill our judgment should not be obscured by the exception presented by the coal-mining situation to an otherwise unprecedented record of industrial peace since Pearl Harbor. Although a number of strikes have occurred since the declaration of war, they have, with very few exceptions, been unauthorized stoppages of short duration opposed by the responsible leadership of organized labor, and the total man-days lost have been less than at any other time in our industrial history.

The bill contains numerous coercive provisions, including injunctions and criminal penalties. At the same time it impliedly recognizes the propriety of strikes after a 30-day notice and a secret ballot. In both these respects the bill runs squarely counter to the national policy embodied in the voluntary and unconditional no-strike agreement entered into by industry and labor with the President immediately after Pearl Harbor. This agreement, which represents the cornerstone of our wartime industrial-relations structure, has been supplemented in a number of industries by written agreements outlawing strikes and lock-outs for the period of the war. This nationally accepted arrangement, whereby strikes and lock-outs have been outlawed by voluntary action, has proven by experience so satisfactory that a change in the arrangement should be approached with greatest caution. It would seem unwise in time of war to experiment with an untried substitute for a policy whose worth is already demonstrated.

"The absence of any comment in this letter on other features of the bill does not necessarily imply approval of those features. The shortage of time has prevented the preparation and submission of any joint detailed analysis. Some of the undersigned agencies will, however, submit comment on certain sections of the bill bearing on problems respecting which they have special knowledge and experience."

Such an expression of disapproval by governmental war and labor agencies should be conclusive.

On May 18 the American Federation of Labor formally reaffirmed its no-strike pledge "as a valid and compelling obligation come what may." It was stated, "No strike will be authorized or approved by the American Federation of Labor and its affiliated unions until the enemies of America have been crushed into final defeat."

This week President Roosevelt reports that America is producing more fighting planes than all of the enemy nations combined; Secretary of the Navy Knox announces that virtually an entire new navy was launched in the first few months of this year; merchant ships are sliding down the ways at a rate never before approached in shipbuilding history; a virtual avalanche of guns, tanks, and ammunition, unsurpassed in quality, is pouring forth from American factories. Production has reached such staggering quantities that Donald Nelson acknowledges there is no further need for expanding plant capacity.

Organized labor takes pride in this accomplishment. The American worker neither expects nor merits restrictive, stultifying legislation such as the Smith-Connally bill as its reward. Such legislation not only constitutes a completely unwarranted reflection upon the patriotism of the American worker, and would result in an incalculable blow to morale, inevitably and seriously impairing production, but constitutes a restriction of the very liberties to preserve which we are fighting this war and would be a definite step in the direction of that form of government imposed upon the people of the enemy countries by their dictators.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the excellent record on the whole of American labor, in view of the attitude of the Government departments involved in carrying on the war. I submit this bill should be defeated.

INTERFERENCE WITH NATIONAL DEFENSE BY STRIKES—RESOLUTION OF KENT COUNTY (MICH.) BOARD OF SUPERVISORS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a telegram for the RECORD, and I wish to make a brief observation in connection with it.

I very much doubt whether Washington appreciates the extent of the bitterness with which the country at large is greeting the deadly news of labor strikes. It is a bitterness, unfortunately, which bodes ill even to the legitimate rights of labor. The time is running short for dealing with this problem in a firm but prudent way. Regardless of whatever merits may be involved in these disputes, all interruptions to defense production will not be and cannot be much longer tolerated by a country whose fighting sons are on deadly battle fronts and whose fate is at the bar of destiny. Those who sow the wind will reap the whirlwind.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a telegram from the board of supervisors of my home county in Michigan be printed in the RECORD at this point and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., June 2, 1943.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolution of the Board of Supervisors of Kent County in session June 2, 1943: Mindful of the young men from Kent County in the military service, many of whom have already paid the full price, we are humiliated to note that our Government in Washington temporizes with the challenge to the sovereignty of 130,00,000 citizens of this Nation offered by John L. Lewis. We ask that our Representatives in Congress, regardless of party, demand that those responsible for this sabotage and obstruction of the national defense be dealt with summarily as enemies of the Republic. Yeas, 54; nays, 0.

LEWIS J. DONOVAN, County Clerk.

FEDERAL REAL ESTATE BOARD (H. DOC. NO. 216)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, yesterday there was received by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, from the President of the United States, a report from a special committee which he had appointed to study and make recommendations upon the question of communities adversely affected by the Federal purchase of substantial quantities of land and their consequent removal from the tax rolls. In the committee we have had numerous requests from the States for copies of the report. In order that we may comply with the requests, I ask unanimous consent that the report and the President's letter may be printed as a Senate document with an illustration.

There being no objection, the communication from the President of the United States transmitting a report on Federal contributions to States and local governmental units with respect to federally owned real estate was ordered to be printed with an illustration as a Senate document.

PRICE FIXING PROGRAMS AND INFLATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from the Wisconsin Council of Agriculture, from which I read but one sentence:

Economists agree that the disparity between income and living costs is a real problem in the picture of inflation.

I ask that this letter, from Milo K. Swanton, executive secretary, be printed in the RECORD following my remarks, together with copies of telegrams which were sent by the Council of Agriculture to Hon. Claude R. Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, and to Hon. James Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization.

There being no objection, the letter and telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WISCONSIN COUNCIL OF AGRICULTURE (COOPERATIVE),
Madison, Wis., June 1, 1943.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WILEY: The time has come for Washington officials who are experimenting and tinkering with price programs to face facts in a clear, statesmanlike manner. They say they are determined to prevent inflation. They think only in terms of the kind of inflation that has to do with cost of living, apparently not realizing that inflation began about 2 years ago with high industrial wage rates and high cost of industrial goods and defense materials.

It is humanly impossible as well as inconsistent to accept and to condone inflation on one hand while on the other hand attempting to curb the whole problem of inflation by rolling back and controlling the price of food.

Price roll-back with subsidy is a form of delayed inflation because it increases the amount of surplus funds in the hands of people and because it increases the total national debt. Both of these factors contribute to inflation.

Price roll-back with subsidy is economically unsound because it reduces living costs at a time when the American people are most able to pay. To the extent that living costs are now lowered, the national debt will be increased. In other words, it means postponing the full cost of living for posterity to pay when incomes may be lower and when unemployment may be prevalent. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the cost of living in February 1943 had increased about 20 percent over the average cost of living for the period of 1935 to 1939. However, during the same period, the earnings for employed industrial workers increased nearly 80 percent.

Economists agree that the disparity between income and living costs is a real problem in the picture of inflation. This unspent income has been rising each year. According to Bowman and Hart of Iowa State College, there were $6,000,000,000 of unspent income in 1939. This rose to $27,000,000,000 in 1942. It is estimated this will reach the astounding figure of $55,000,000,000 during the coming fiscal year. In spite of this and to make the situation worse, the Government announces a roll-back of prices with subsidy, demands raising the national debt to make such a system possible while simultaneously financing a gigantic war, all of which must be paid by future generations. All of this the administration insisted upon in the name of helping the consumers who now have the greatest income in the history of our country. This is cowardly statesmanship.

Wisconsin farmers insist only on a fair price for their products in the markets of the Nation. They strenuously oppose price roll-backs with subsidy. Such a program will lead to confusion, uncertainty, and lack of confidence. It will tend to curtail production and increase consumption. The administration's low-food price complex on one hand with high-price war and industrial goods on the other hand is inconsistent and dangerous to the war effort.

The administration's program of food price roll-back with subsidy is a program of postponed inflation. It is a program of responsibility dodging, a program of politics, and a policy of economic insanity. It is high time to consider the general welfare in a true statesmanlike manner, rather than appease certain segments in our national society. The farmers of Wisconsin ask the National Congress to assert its rights as elective representatives of the people to end this proposed system of price roll-back with subsidy, which in the long run will threaten our national stability.

Sincerely yours,

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary.

JUNE 1, 1943.

Hon. CLAUDE R. WICKARD,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

Wisconsin dairymen and livestock farmers insist that fair prices in market place are more conducive to all-out production than any system of price roll-backs with subsidy. Forty Wisconsin farm organizations, members of Wisconsin Council of Agriculture, protest butter price roll-back subsidy program as leading to confusion, uncertainty, and discouragement. We firmly believe similar program applied to livestock will discourage production, at the same time encourage consumption. As you know, such program involving livestock price ceilings means tinkering with America's most sensitive, complicated phase of marketing. Price roll-back with subsidy is a form of delayed inflation—a refusal to pay our current bills with high incomes and when surplus cash is piling up, leaving same to be paid by posterity with low incomes and possible unemployment. Urge understanding dairymen's and livestock producers' problems. Need action based on sound economic policy to prevent otherwise inevitable food disaster.

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary, Wisconsin Council of Agriculture (Cooperative).

JUNE 1, 1943.

Hon. JAMES BYRNES,
Director War Mobilization, Washington, D. C.:

Wisconsin farmers insist that fair prices in market place more encouraging to all-out production and less conducive to uncertainty and confusion than system of price roll-backs with subsidy. No economic justification since consumer income is above average and since roll-back subsidy program increases national debt for future generations to pay with inevitably lower incomes. Roll-back subsidy program positively inflationary because will pile up more unspent millions at present and more staggering debt for future.

MILO K. SWANTON,
Executive Secretary, Wisconsin Council of Agriculture (Cooperative).

THE COAL CONTROVERSY

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, yesterday I asked and received unanimous consent to introduce and discuss today what I regard as an important and constructive measure, to meet pressing war and post-war problems of internal security, touching the welfare and happiness of almost every American family. I was especially impelled to do so because the bill in question has the strong endorsement of the responsible leadership of American labor, organized in the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. This leadership, and the millions of working people for whom they speak, have made the most valiant and patriotic contribution to the war effort, and have built up a splendid record of cooperation with Government authority and with industrial management to reduce strikes in war time to such a point that they are insignificant by comparison with the tremendous labor conflicts which raged in this country during the last war.

Late yesterday another labor leader invoked a law which bears my name, the National Labor Relations Act, to justify the most irresponsible and disastrous stoppage of work in a key war industry since the war began. I am using this first opportunity to repudiate and denounce the assertion that the Magna Carta of American labor, the law which guarantees the most sacred freedom of the American worker to associate with his fellows under our democracy, justifies or approves an action undermining the war effort.

Men and women in our armed forces are scattered over the earth, risking at this very moment everything they have and hold dear, in defense of our democratic way of life—yes; in defense of the right of workers to organize as free men and take their rightful place, in cooperation with management and government, in our democratic society. The cruel enemies we face across the seas made labor unions the first object of their violent attack in their own countries, because these leaders knew that the free association of working people under democratic trade unions was the greatest obstacle to their dictatorship, and the greatest threat to their continued reign of error and oppression. I say the statement of this labor leader is a cruel blasphemy of the most sacred rights of free labor guaranteed under the Labor Relations Act.

The right to strike is a part of the liberty we are fighting for. The Labor Act preserves that liberty. But there is nothing in that act which says that labor cannot agree not to strike, during a war, or voluntarily put restraints on its customary privileges, so as to lend its full strength in a democratic war. The very object of the Labor Act is to promote voluntary, peaceful relations by agreements of free labor and free management. The test of democracy is whether every group that shares in the fruits of democratic progress will also share the privilege of sacrifice, and submerge its own interest to the strong United Nation we must have in order to win victory, and to win it with the smallest cost in the lives of our boys. The great mass of American labor and labor leadership have met that test, by entering into and carrying out their no-strike pledge. The freedom assured by the Labor Act is responsible in great degree for this voluntary and convincing demonstration of labor's patriotism and responsibility.

The no-strike pledge was agreed to by the president of the United Mine Workers. The area of negotiation and award under the War Labor Board's jurisdiction in this controversy covers all the justified demands of the coal miners. This agreement with all the American people is certainly no less sacred—indeed it is far more serious—than any other agreement not to strike negotiated between the coal miners and coal operators in the past.

I am sure that the great mass of organized labor, and the responsibile leaders of organized labor, will join me in resenting this suggestion of one man that their rights as free workers can and should be used to undermine war production, and defy the Government authority which they themselves participated in establishing immediately after Pearl Harbor.

I have spoken out in defense of labor and the miners, many times in the past, when popular feeling ran high against them. I will do so again when their cause is just. I am not responsible for the mental processes of any man who would use what may be a thoroughly justifiable grievance to cloak irresponsible action giving aid and comfort to our enemies abroad and to the enemies of labor at home. I do not think Congress or the country should hold responsible for this action the great mass of labor and their cooperative, patriotic leadership. It would be a tragic mistake, indeed it would play directly into the hands of extremists in the ranks of both management and labor, to pass hasty legislation as an expression of justified resentment over the irresponsible course of one leader in one controversy. That too, would undermine our unity and impair our war effort.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. President I now ask unanimous consent to introduce, for myself and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], a bill to amend and improve the Social Security Act to meet the post-war needs of the American people. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance, and also to the Committee on Post-War Problems.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator made the request yesterday to introduce the bill, and the request was unanimously granted.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1161) to provide for the general welfare; to alleviate the economic hazards of old age, premature death, disability, sickness, unemployment, and dependency; to amend and extend the provisions of the Social Security Act; to establish a Unified National Social Insurance System; to extend the coverage, and to protect and extend the social-security rights of individuals in the military service; to provide insurance benefits for workers permanently disabled; to establish a Federal system of unemployment compensation, temporary disability, and maternity benefits; to establish a national system of public employment offices; to establish a Federal system of medical and hospitalization benefits; to encourage and aid the advancement of knowledge and skill in the provision of health services and in the prevention of sickness, disability, and premature death; to enable the several States to make more adequate provision for the needy aged, the blind, dependent children, and other needy persons; to enable the States to establish and maintain a comprehensive public assistance program; and to amend the Internal Revenue Code, introduced by Mr. WAGNER (for himself and Mr. MURRAY), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, because I am being called out of Washington for a few days, I wish to offer now a few comments on the bill I have just introduced, especially as it bears on the immediate wartime issues of taxation and inflation.

POST-WAR EMPLOYMENT PROBLEM

I approach the post-war problem on the basis of hard facts. As a nation, we are just beginning to realize the enormity of the economic issues which will confront us when 35,000,000 war workers and servicemen go forth in search of peacetime jobs. The National Industrial Conference Board, a very conservative board primarily representing industry, has just reported that "demobilization will create an employment problem greater in magnitude than the task of finding jobs for all the men employed in manufacturing in 1939," the year the war began. Every one of us is answerable, for the helpful solution of that problem, to the employers, farmers, and investors of the country, to the millions we have moved into war work, and to the millions whom we sent into the front line of battle.

Mr. President, I do not believe in "selling short" the American system of free enterprise. I am confident that if we do our part it will come through this crisis stronger, with greater opportunities for investment and greater vistas of new markets and new products than ever before

THE ROLE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE

The help and cooperation of the Federal Government—Congress and the Executive together—will be most needed and most effective in the first stages of post-war adjustment—in the care we exercise in demobilizing the armed forces, tapering off war orders, readjusting the tax laws, disposing of war plants, providing public works, and maintaining price control and safeguards against inflation. But with the best of cooperation and intentions and the fullest play to private initiative, the largest burden on record will be placed upon unemployment insurance and our public employment offices. And along with that will come our greatest need, in the interest of business as well as human welfare, to maintain steady family and consumer income when wages are cut off, in periods of illness and disability, and in time of old age. In this field of social insurance we have already seen how it is possible and practical to insure people against the major causes of want, so that our system of free enterprise can go on in periods of crisis as well as prosperity.

The bill deals with that limited but essential phase of post-war adjustment. Many of its separate provisions have been advocated by numerous groups and public-spirited citizens, by small businessmen, by State public-welfare administrators, and, on one point, by several State legislatures. I am authorized to say that the bill has the strong endorsement of the responsible and patriotic American labor leadership, organized in the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

The bill establishes a Nation-wide system of public employment offices, to help war workers and war veterans to avail themselves of job opportunities, in private industry and on farms, throughout the country. It covers broadly the major economic hazards of average American families—the cost of medical and hospital care, and loss of income in time of unemployment, temporary sickness, permanent disability, and old age. It improves the present old-age insurance system, and extends coverage to 15,000,000 persons now excluded, such as farm workers and domestic servants, employees of nonprofit institutions, and the independent farmer, professional and small businessman. All these changes are established under a unified national system of social insurance, with 1 set of contributions, 1 set of records and reports, and 1 set of local offices. Reinforcing the job guaranty in the Selective Service Act, the bill gives the returning veteran and his family, paid-up benefit rights in every phase of this insurance protection. And finally, the bill sets up an improved, unified system for grants-in-aid to the States for public assistance, on a variable matching basis, in place of the rigid categories under present law.

SOCIAL-INSURANCE COLLECTIONS HELP FIGHT INFLATION

In my judgment the bill, while addressed to post-war problems, is a vital factor in the battle against inflation, which commands our attention at this very hour. The danger of inflation today springs from two separate but related sources. The first is an inflationary gap of at least $25,000,000,000 this fiscal year—a gap between the money available for civilian purchases and the supply of goods available for sale. This gap creates a pressure on price ceilings which cannot be eliminated by price control or rationing alone. The second phase of the danger is the tremendous reserve of liquid savings during the war years, which will go into the market for consumer goods immediately upon the close of hostilities.

We know that tax collections are meeting only about one-third of the current cost of the war. We know that almost seven-eighths of current income is earned by the great mass of workers, white-collar people, and minor executives earning less than $5,000 a year after taxes. Obviously this group must be our chief reliance in obtaining any substantial increase in either taxes or savings, requested by the President for the coming fiscal year.

The social-insurance plan under this bill is to be financed, at the outset, by equal pay roll contributions of employers and employees—6 percent each—except for payments by the Treasury to cover the insurance rights of war veterans. Government contributions to the fund are contemplated, but would begin some years after the war. By increasing social-insurance collections now, we would reach the very incomes with the greatest wartime purchasing power. By the same means, we would avoid the post-war inflationary danger of ordinary savings, War bond purchases, or even "forced" savings, because social-insurance contributions are to be paid into a trust fund, and cannot be sold, redeemed, or converted by the contributor or beneficiary. The funds would be invested in Government bonds which would be held solely for the purposes provided by law.

This bill would increase contributions about $5,000,000,000 above present levels, and the bulk of the increase would come out of the wages of the workers themselves. The new benefits, which would cause the greatest current drain upon current collections, would not be payable immediately. A reserve would have to be built up to meet post-war needs. Therefore, the new benefits would be scheduled to begin no sooner than 1 year after collections were first levied and no later than 6 months after the close of the war, as the President might decide upon the basis of conditions at the time.

Our economy can readily afford the proposed increase in pay-roll collections. Employers already pay 4 percent of their pay rolls toward unemployment and old-age insurance. Under present law, beginning in 1944, employers will be paying 5 percent. This bill provides for only a 1-percent increase, an increase which would more than pay for itself to the employer, and to industry at large, by increased efficiency and morale, and by reduced absenteeism on account of illness. As for employees, their pay-roll contribution, under existing law, will be 2 percent in 1944. This bill would make a 4-percent increase, but they would get their full money's worth in increased security. The workers of the country, speaking through their great national organizations, are willing to pay increased contributions for increased insurance protection. This bill proposes a real pay-as-you-go insurance plan—a workable, conservative means for the individual to help build reserves for his future security, just as we permit corporations to build reserves for their post-war needs.

I shall not take time now to discuss other phases of the bill, how it compares with, and differs from, the Beveridge plan in Great Britain; how the health-insurance program would guarantee free choice of patient and doctor; and why a national system of unemployment insurance is so vital for the practical needs of war veterans and war workers returning to peacetime occupations. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the close of my remarks, a statement I have released covering these phases in some detail, including data showing the great variations and the inadequate benefit levels of most State unemployment insurance laws.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I only ask that Senators give the bill their careful study, and await full committee hearings before reaching final decisions on some points which admittedly are controversial.

The plan is an American plan, geared to the wage scales and standards of living of the individual families in various sections of the country. It would protect our wartime economy and would reduce the need of post-war spending for relief. The plan provides for a practical program within our ability to pay. The program is a practical one in a much higher sense. Our democracy could provide no better bulwark against communism, no better safeguard against fascism and rabble-rousers in the troubled times ahead, than to develop this dignified, all-embracing plan for social security upon which the individual family could build its own future by its own efforts.

EXHIBIT A

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

This bill establishes a Nation-wide system of public employment offices to help war workers and war veterans to avail themselves of job opportunities in private industry and on farms throughout the country. It covers broadly the major economic hazards of average people throughout their lifetime—loss of income in time of unemployment, sickness, permanent disability, and old age. It assures medical care and hospital service for the American people, while protecting the free choice by the patient of doctor and hospital and the free choice of patient by the doctor and the hospital. It increases the old-age benefit allowances for workers and their families and extends coverage to 15,000,000 now excluded, such as farm workers and domestic servants, employees of nonprofit instituitions, and the independent farmer, professional, and small businessman.

Along with these improvements the bill creates a unified system of social insurance, with one set of contributions, one set of records and reports, and one set of local offices. This makes possible a more efficient administration, reduces the number of reports and the cost to employers, and simplifies the entire program for workers, employers, and the public.

The bill extends all these phases of insurance protection to the members of our armed forces upon their return to civilian life, whether or not they were covered or had accumulated benefit rights in previous years. This includes a special unemployment allowance for 26 or possibly 52 weeks, up to a maximum of $30 per week, depending on the size of his family.

To supplement this broad plan of social insurance, the bill also sets up an improved, unified system for grants-in-aid to the States for public assistance, on a variable matching basis, in place of the rigid categories under present law.

This is an American plan, geared to our own experience, form of government, and standard of living. Put into operation, this bill would greatly reduce the cost of post-war spending for relief purposes.

I do not claim this bill is in any sense a perfect instrument; it is offered simply as a basis for legislative study and consideration. The important thing is that we develop a social-insurance system secure enough and courageous enough to meet the actual needs of servicemen and war workers returning to peacetime life. Many of the separate provisions of the bill have been advocated by numerous groups, public-spirited citizens, small businessmen, State public-welfare administrators, and on one point, by several State legislatures. I am also authorized to say that this bill has the strong endorsement of both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. Responsible American labor leadership advocates this constructive plan for meeting a foremost national problem.

THE POST-WAR ROLE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE

I do not believe in selling short the American system of free enterprise. I am confident that if we do our part, it will come through this crisis stronger, with greater opportunities for investment, and greater vistas of new markets and new products, than ever before.

In the first stages of post-war adjustment, the Federal Government—Congress and the Executive—can be most helpful, by the care we exercise in demobilizing the armed forces, tapering off war orders, disposing of war plants, providing public works, and maintaining price control and safeguards against inflation. I know that these and other problems will have the careful attention of the Senate's post-war committee. But with the best of cooperation between Government and industry, and with the fullest freedom for the creative genius of free enterprise, the largest burden on record will be placed upon unemployment insurance and our public employment offices. And along with that will come our greatest need—in the interest of business as well as human welfare—to maintain steady family and consumer income when wages are cut off, in periods of illness and disability and in time of old age.

This bill is directed to those limited but essential phases of post-war adjustment. In this field of social security we already have an extensive record of actual experience. We have seen how it is possible and practical to insure people against the major causes of want, so that our system of free enterprise can go on in periods of depression as well as prosperity.

Even if the war ends in 1945, we have little time left for the careful study and preparation such an important program requires.

CONTRAST WITH BEVERIDGE PLAN

First, the Beveridge plan puts more than half the cost upon the General Treasury in the very first year of operation. The social insurance plan under this bill is financed at the outset by equal pay-roll contribution of employers and employees, except for the payments into the fund by the Treasury to cover the insurance rights of war veterans. (There would be some additional increases out of general revenue to cover grants to the States for public assistance.) I personally favor a substantial Government contribution into the social insurance trust fund, but appreciate that the Treasury cannot carry this burden now on top of its war and immediate post-war needs. This bill therefore contemplates Government contribution into the fund beginning after a period of perhaps 10 or 15 years, and increasing gradually until it represents about one-third of the total when old-age benefits paid out reach their maximum under present population trends. To maintain flexibility, however, the bill directs the advisory council to study the entire problem of financing in the post-war years.

Second, the Beveridge plan provides the same contribution and the same benefit for all classes and groups, with variation only as to sex and number of dependents. This bill follows the traditional American system of gearing both contributions and benefits to past wages, as well as dependents. The bill thus automatically adjusts to different standards of living, wage scales and family needs of workers in different sections, States, and industries throughout the country.

Third, the Beveridge plan provides a guaranteed minimum income for life. This bill puts definite limits on the duration of insurance benefits for unemployment, temporary disability, and hospital care.

Fourth, this bill does not cover many matters embraced in the Beveridge plan, such as provision for workmen's compensation, grants on marriage and birth of children, children's allowances, dental care, nursing or medicines in the home.

FREEDOM OF MEDICAL PRACTICE

There is no plan here, such as that lately considered in Britain, for a system of socialized medicine, with all doctors required to be salaried employees of the Government. Unlike this British proposal, my bill assures complete freedom of choice of doctor and hospital by the patient, and freedom of medical practice and types of remuneration for the doctor and the hospital. No doctor is forced into the insurance system or forced on a salary status. Arrangements for obtaining medical, laboratory, or hospital care would be essentially as they are now in this country, except that payment for the care and services would be out of the insurance fund, built up through the insurance premiums paid by the individual and his employer. Voluntary hospitals would, of course, be eligible to participate in the plan if they choose to do so, and thus be enabled to expand their splendid community services. Nonprofit group medical or hospitalization plans may also be utilized in carrying out the program, and they would be in a position to offer supplementary health protection for families desiring more than the basic social-insurance benefits guaranteed under the bill. In all its provisions, this bill would promote the personal relations between doctor and patient, and be adapted to the needs and practices of the individual community, and the wishes of the doctors in that community, in both rural and urban areas. Similar basic principles as to medical and hospital benefits and freedom of medical practice, are embodied in a program recently put forward by the government of Canada, with the full accord of the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Hospital Council.

SOCIAL-INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS HELP FIGHT INFLATION

The bill would also help meet our immediate wartime-inflation problem. The danger of inflation today springs from two separate but related sources. The first is an inflationary gap of about $25,000,000,000 this fiscal year—a gap between the money available for civilian purchases and the supply of goods available for sale. This gap creates a pressure on price ceilings which cannot be eliminated by price control or rationing alone. The second phase of the danger is the tremendous accumulation of savings during the war years, which will be available for the purchase of consumer goods immediately upon the close of war.

The Secretary of the Treasury has recently told the American people that tax collections are meeting only about 30 percent of the current cost of the war. He declared that almost seven-eights of current income is earned by the great mass of workers, white-collar people, and minor executives earning less than $5,000 a year after taxes. Obviously this group must be our chief reliance in obtaining the large increase, in either taxes or savings, requested by the President for the coming fiscal year.

By increasing social-insurance collections now, under the broadened benefit structure of this bill, we would reach the very incomes referred to by the Treasury. At the same time, we avoid the post-war inflationary danger of ordinary savings, War bond purchases, or even forced savings, because social-insurance contributions cannot be redeemed, canceled out, or converted into a loan or a cash surrender.

Under this bill contributions into a social-insurance trust fund would be about $5,000,000,000 more than present collections, and most of the increase will come out of the wages of the workers themselves.

We can readily afford this increase in pay-roll collections. Employers already pay 3 percent of pay roll toward unemployment insurance and 1 percent toward old-age benefits; by operation of the law, the old-age levy will go to 2 percent next year, making a total of 5 percent on employers in 1944. This bill provides only a 1-percent increase—an increase which would more than pay for itself to employers in increased efficiency and morale, and reduced absenteeism on account of illness, not to speak of the benefits to our economy as a whole.

As for employees, under the present law, beginning January 1944 their pay-roll contribution will amount to 2 percent. This bill makes a 4-percent increase, but for that increase they obtain their full money's worth in increased security. The workers of the country, speaking through their great national organizations, have expressed willingness to pay increased contributions for increased insurance protection.

This bill proposes a real pay-as-you-go plan—a workable, established, conservative mechanism whereby the individual may help build reserves for his future security just as we permit corporations to build reserves for their post-war needs.

NEED FOR NATIONAL SYSTEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

No one can question that unemployment insurance, no less than old-age insurance, presents a national problem within the proper concern of the Federal Government. There is no real issue of State or Federal "rights." Our concern is with the practical needs, reemployment rights and job security of millions of war workers and returning soldiers from every State in the Union.

About half the working population in peacetime was not covered by State unemployment insurance laws. Therefore about half the returning soldiers will have no benefit rights at all. As for those who are eligible, it should be realized that benefits are utterly inadequate, do not grant dependents benefits and do not cover wages lost by illness. In 1940 and in 1941—fairly good years—half the beneficiaries of State unemployment insurance laws were still without a job when their limited benefit rights were exhausted.

Servicemen from different States share the same hardships and face the same dangers in defense of freedom. Why should they be subject to 48 widely different and largely inadaquate benefit systems when they return to civilian life and find themselves out of a job? Under this bill, the returning soldier would have the benefit of uniform minimum standards, with extra allowances for dependents, with a maximum of $30 a week for a possible duration of 52 weeks. These benefits would be payable whether the returning soldier lost his income because he was sick or disabled, or because his job had run out. While he himself is entitled, without cost, to medical and hospital care in a veterans' hospital, under present veterans' legislation, that does not cover his wife and dependents. This bill covers these dependents.

The same injustice under 48 different State laws would befall the millions of war workers, many of whom have shifted from one State to another under the prompting of patriotism and the urging of our war administrators.

The plan for a Federal system is in keeping with the insurance principle that you increase the safety and diminish the cost of an insurance risk by covering the largest possible numbers of people in the same insurance pool.

Nothing in this bill contemplates taking away from the States the $4,000,000,000 in trust funds now held in 51 separate accounts. If a State insists on going its own way, it would have full sovereignty over this fund and continue to pay benefits thereunder.

SUMMARY OF MAJOR CHANGES IN THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT PROVIDED BY THE BILL

Section 1. Unified national social insurance system (new title I-A): This section outlines the scope of the unified national social insurance system created by the bill. The system would consist of a national system of public employment offices; old-age and survivors' insurance; permanent disability insurance and lump-sum death benefits; protection of the social-security rights of men and women in military service; unemployment insurance; temporary disability insurance and maternity benefits; unemployment allowances upon termination of military service; and medical and hospitalization insurance.

Section 2. National system of employment offices (new title I-B): The bill provides for a new national system of public employment offices established in the Social Security Board, to assist war workers and war veterans to avail themselves of civilian employment opportunities throughout the Nation, to promote employment in private industry and on farms, and, generally, to bring together available workers and available jobs in the maximum use of the Nation's productive facilities and manpower. Among other duties, the new employment service is directed to provide facilities in cooperation with the administration of unemployment insurance and to aid in minimizing the necessity for the payment of unemployment insurance, relief, and assistance. The Wagner-Peyser Act, under which the Federal-State Employment Service has functioned, is repealed. Six months after the termination of hostilities in the present war, the present employment service and all related activities of the War Manpower Commission are transferred to the new United States Employment Service created by the bill.

Section 3. Permanent disability insurance; lump-sum death benefits: Effective January 1, 1944, the present Federal old-age and survivors' insurance system is amended to include monthly cash benefits where the insured worker is permanently disabled before he reaches the retirement age. These benefits would be equal to those paid under old-age insurance, and in the same way would be increased for the worker who has a dependent wife, dependent children, or dependent parents. Where the disabled worker can be rehabilitated so that he may return to work, the bill authorizes the Social Security Board to arrange, through the United States Public Health Service, for proper medical, surgical, hospitalization, or other helpful services to be furnished by practitioners, hospitals, or other agencies (sec. 13).

The bill also amends the present old-age insurance provisions by reducing from 65 to 60 years the age when the woman worker becomes eligible for old-age benefits.

Upon the death of any insured worker, the bill provides for a lump-sum death payment to the surviving spouse equal to six times the primary old-age or survivors benefit of that worker. If there is no surviving spouse, this lump-sum benefit will be paid to any other person equitably entitled, to the extent that he has paid the burial expenses of the deceased worker.

Section 4. Old-age maximum benefits increased to $120 per month; minimum increased to $30 for aged couple: Effective January 1, 1944, the maximum old-age and survivors insurance benefit is increased from $85 under present law, to $120. The minimum benefit is increased from $10 under present law to $20 for a single worker and $30 for a worker with a dependent wife age 60 or over. Thus the bill provides an assured minimum of $30 a month for an insured aged couple, and higher payments up to a maximum of $120, depending on prior wages and years of employment. The same minimum and maximum provisions would apply in the case of permanent disability.

Section 5. Increased coverage under old-age insurance: This section extends coverage under the Federal old-age, survivors, and permanent disability insurance to agricultural and domestic workers, employees of nonprofit institutions (except ministers and members of religious orders), and hourly employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Present or future employees of State or local governments who are covered by existing pension systems continue to be exempt, as under the present law. Employees of State or local governments who are not under existing pension systems may be covered (under old-age, survivors, permanent disability, medical care, and hospital insurance) by a voluntary compact between the Social Security Board and the appropriate State or local governmental unit.

Section 6. Increased old-age insurance benefits: Effective January 1, 1944, the bill increases old-age, survivors, and permanent disability benefits by $5 to $20 per month depending upon the amount of an individual's wages; and also increases benefits by changing the method for calculating the average wage. The bill also changes the provisions for determining the insured status of an individual so that all persons engaged in Government arsenals, or any other type of war work not covered by the social insurance system, will not have this period prior to 1944 count against them in determining their eligibility for old-age, survivors, and permanent disability insurance benefits.

Section 7. Old-age insurance coverage of self-employed farmers, professional and small businessmen: Effective January 1, 1944, the bill extends the benefits of the entire old age, survivors, and permanent disability insurance system to all self-employed persons; that is, independent farmers, professional people and small businessmen.

Section 8. Social security protection to men and women now in military service (new title II–A): The bill gives "wage credits" to men and women in the armed forces for the entire period of their military service. The individual war veteran and his family would thus be insured for all social insurance benefits provided in the bill, without deductions from their pay during military service. The cost of this protection is borne by the Federal Government out of general revenue.

Section 9. Federal unemployment insurance system; temporary disability insurance; maternity benefits. The bill establishes a new Federal unemployment insurance system administered by the Social Security Board. Unemployment benefits are payable for 26 weeks. If the funds available are deemed adequate, the duration of benefits may be extended to a maximum total of 52 weeks, but the Board may require attendance at a training course as a condition for receiving such extended benefits. Coverage includes agriculture as well as industrial workers, American seamen, domestic servants, and employees of nonprofit institutions (except ministers and members of religious orders). Weekly benefits are payable at 50 percent of the first $12 of average weekly wage, plus 25 percent of the wage between $12 and $56. As in the case of old-age insurance, benefits are increased for workers with dependent wives, dependent children, or dependent parents. The maximum benefit payable is $30 per week. The waiting period is 1 week. Eligibility depends, among other factors, upon registration and continued reporting for work at the public employment office or at training courses approved by the Board. Failure to report or to accept suitable work when offered is a ground for disqualification.

Insured workers who are certified as temporarily disabled, through illness or injury, are likewise eligible for the same benefits, after 1 week's waiting period, for a maximum duration of 26 weeks. In addition to the maximum duration for disability benefits, married women workers are entitled to weekly benefits, in the above amounts, for 12 weeks of maternity leave.

Section 10. Unemployment allowance on termination of military service: Men and women discharged from military service are granted unemployment compensation allowances varying from $12 to $30 per week of unemployment, depending on the number of their dependents. Benefits are payable for 26 weeks of unemployment, and for a possible maximum of 52 weeks if that maximum is established for other insured workers under the unemployment insurance system. Conditions of continued eligibility and disqualification are similar to those applicable to other insured workers.

The cost of these allowances to veterans of the present war is to be borne by the Federal Government out of general revenues.

Section 11. Medical care and hospital benefits: This section sets up a Federal system of medical and hospital insurance for all persons covered under old-age and survivors' insurance and for their dependents. Each insured worker and his dependent wife and children would be entitled to the services of a physician who is a general practitioner, and, on the doctor's advice, to specialists, consultant, and laboratory services (including X-ray, appliances, eyeglasses, etc.) and necessary hospital care. Freedom of medical practice is carefully safeguarded. Each insured person is entitled to choose his own doctor from among all physicians in the community who have voluntarily agreed to go into the insurance system. Each doctor is free to go in or stay out of the insurance system. Those doctors who participate are free to accept or reject patients who may wish to select them as their family doctor, and the participating doctors are likewise free to choose the method of payment from the insurance fund. Doctors practicing as specialists would be entitled to special rates of payment if they meet professional standards for specialists. Thus, existing arrangements for choosing a doctor and obtaining medical, laboratory, or hospital care would not be disturbed except that payment would be out of the insurance system. Three percent of wages and salaries, collected through the unified contributions under the entire social insurance system, are set aside in a special account to meet these insurance costs. The bill contains various provisions to assure that medical benefits will be the highest quality that can be made generally available, will promote personal relations between doctor and patient, will emphasize prevention of disease, and will be adapted to the needs and practices of the community, in both rural and urban areas.

The Surgeon General of the United States Public Health would administer the technical and professional aspects of the program, while financial matters and social-insurance relationships would be administered by the Social Security Board. The Surgeon General would also be authorized to work out the closest possible coordination between medical care and the public health services of the Federal, State, and local governments.

Hospital care is limited to 30 days per year, with a possible maximum of 90 days if experience proves that the insurance fund can afford it. All qualified hospitals are eligible to participate, and all illnesses are covered for hospital care except tuberculosis or mental disease. The insurance system would assure all essential hospital services and at least ward services. The cash benefit or the rate of payment to hospitals would be not less than $3 nor more than $6 per day up to 30 days in a benefit year.

The insured medical care covers all necessary service; limitations may be fixed later by the Surgeon General and the Social Security Board if it should prove necessary. The medical and hospital care program would not include medicines outside the hospital, dental care, home nursing, private hospital rooms, and certain other services. This leaves a wide field for continued operation and development of voluntary hospital and medical service plans to supplement the minimum insurance benefits. No medical or hospital services are made available with respect to any injury, disease, or disability for which these services can be obtained under a workmen's compensation plan of the United States or any State.

The Surgeon General is directed to establish a Medical and Hospital Advisory Council. Members of this council would be appointed from panels of names submitted by professional and other organizations concerned with medical services, education, hospitals, etc. The council would also include representatives of the public who are informed on medical and hospital care and related needs. The Surgeon General is authorized to negotiate cooperative working arrangements with appropriate agencies of the United States or any State or political subdivision, and with private agencies, institutions, groups, or individuals, to utilize their services and facilities on payment of fair and reasonable compensation. Insured persons, or the Social Security Board, or the Surgeon General may transfer or assign to a participating hospital or any other agency or institution utilized in the program any monies paid or payable as benefits under the program. The medical, hospital, and related benefits may be furnished to noninsured persons if appropriate arrangements are made to pay the cost on their behalf.

Section 12. Social insurance contributions; trust fund: The bill establishes a 6 percent employee and a 6 percent employer contribution on all wages and salaries (up to the first $3,000 a year), paid or received (after December 31, 1943) for all social insurance benefits. The employer contribution is payable by employers of one or more employees. Self-employed persons contribute 7 percent of the market value of their services (up to the first $3,000), after December 31, 1943, to cover old-age and survivors, permanent disability, and medical and hospital insurance. In the case of public employees of States and localities (not covered by their own pension systems), contribution of 3½ percent from the employer and 3½ percent from the employee is required to cover the same benefits where voluntary compacts are made under the terms of the bill.

The bill creates a "Federal social-insurance trust fund," to which is transferred existing funds credited to the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system. A board of trustees, composed of the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board, is established to hold the trust fund and make annual reports to Congress on the benefit payments and the expected status of the fund during the next ensuing 5-year periods. The Secretary of the Treasury, as managing trustee, is authorized to invest such portion of the trust fund as is not required to meet current withdrawals. As under present law, such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States.

Section 13. Advisory council; grants for medical education, research and prevention; reduction of benefits: The bill would establish a Federal Social Security Advisory Council, representing employers, employees, and the general public, to formulate policies on legislation and administration, and to investigate and make recommendations concerning coverage of various groups; the adequacy of benefits in relation to wage levels, cost of living, employment practices, and other factors, especially in the post-war period; and the financing of the insurance system.

The Surgeon General is authorized and directed, with the advice of the Medical and Hospital Advisory Council, to administer grants-in-aid to nonprofit institutions and agencies, engaging in research or in undergraduate or post-graduate professional education. Such grants would be made for projects showing promise of making valuable contributions to the education and training of persons in furnishing medical and hospital, disability, and related benefits, or of making valuable contribution to human knowledge with respect to the cause, prevention, or methods of diagnosis or treatment of disease or disability. The maximum sum available each year for such grants-in-aid would be 1 percent of the total expended for all benefits from the social-insurance trust funds exclusive of unemployment insurance benefits, or 2 percent of the amount expended for medical care and hospitalization benefit, whichever is less.

Benefits payable under old-age, survivors, and permanent-disability insurance, temporary disability or unemployment insurance are reduced by the amount of any noncontributory Government benefit, allowance annuity, or compensation paid under any similar law or plan of the United States or any State or political subdivision—for example, workmen's compensation benefits. Benefits under the foregoing systems would also be reduced by one-half the amount of any contributory benefits payable under a similar plan or system of the United States or any State supported substantially by direct contributions of wage earners. Both of these provisions for reduction of benefits allow war veterans or their families, however, to receive any additional benefits payable under war-risk insurance, United States life insurance, or national service life insurance.

Section 14. Unified public assistance program: This section places Federal grants to States for assistance to needy persons under a unified public assistance program, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1944. It provides variable Federal grants-in-aid to the States, ranging from 50 percent to 75 percent of the total expended, depending upon the State's per capita income. The higher rates apply to the States with the lower per capita incomes. The program authorizes Federal matching, on this variable grant basis, of money payments to any aged person, dependent child, blind person, or other needy individual (without the rigid maxima provided by existing law); and where so provided in an approved State plan, medical services, goods, or facilities to needy individuals, and such services or facilities as may assist in making needy individuals self-supportng.

These Federal grants-in-aid, like the similar provisions of the present law, are made out of general revenues. As under present law, State plans must meet various requirements, including maintenance of civil-service merit standards for administrative personnel. In determining need, the State must take into consideration any other means and resources of any individual claiming assistance except that the State may, in its discretion, not take into consideration any amounts of current income received by an individual up to $20 per month, in such manner and to such extent as the State may determine.

This unified public-assistance program is designed to replace the categorical assistance programs, under present law, for old-age pensions, aid to the blind, and for dependent children. After December 31, 1945, no further Federal grants-in-aid would be made under those old provisions.

Section 15: This section repeals parts of the present system of social-security taxes replaced by other provisions in the bill.

Section 16. Effective dates: The effective date for the unemployment insurance, unemployment-compensation allowance, temporary disability insurance, and medical and hospital insurance provisions shall be determined by Executive order of the President. Such date shall not be prior to 1 year after the effective date of the contributions levied under the bill, and not later than 6 months after the termination of hostilities in the present war.

Section 17: The short title of the bill is "The Social Security Act amendments of 1943."

SIGNIFICANT DATA ON PROVISIONS AND OPERATION OF STATE UNEMPLOYMENT-COMPENSATION LAWS

Table 1 shows the wide variations in amounts of unemployment-insurance benefits which would be received by four different unemployed individuals under existing State unemployment-insurance laws.

Table 2 shows the wide variations in the relative size of the reserve funds of the various States.

Table 3 is a brief summary of the most important provisions of the State unemployment-insurance laws.

*Indicates minimum weekly benefit amount, minimum amount of potential benefits, or minimum duration.

†Indicates maximum weekly benefit amount, maximum amount of potential benefits, or maximum duration other than uniform duration.

‡Indicates uniform duration.

[1] Based on laws in effect June 1, 1942, except for Kentucky and Pennsylvania, where amendments enacted prior to June 1 were not effective until July 1.

[2] Base period, 8 quarters. If, in preceding 4 quarters, wages (in Florida and Pennsylvania, uncharged wage credits in other States) were equal to wages in 4 quarters specified, maximum potential benefits in a benefit year would be doubled, to maximum specified in State law.

[3] Assumes most favorable distribution of base-period wages in all 4 quarters; concentration in 1 quarter would limit benefits to 4 weeks.

[4] Based on unemployment fund of $40,000,000 or more. The maximum potential benefits, duration, and, in some instances, the weekly benefit amount would be reduced if the balance fell below $40,000,000, with further reductions if the fund fell to $25,000,000 or less.

[5] Weekly benefit amount may be increased by $1 for each dependent up to 3, and weeks of duration reduced accordingly. Weekly benefit amount including dependent's allowance not to exceed $18.

[6] Duration is based on uncharged wage credits in base period of 5 completed calendar quarters and the quarter in which waiting period was served; therefore duration based on 4 quarters may be understated. See footnote 2.

[7] Assuming $50 in each of 2 quarters other than high quarter; otherwise base-period wages of $250 are required and claimant would be ineligible.

[8] Maximum potential benefits and duration reduced by limitation on wage credits to $390 in Iowa and $360 in Wyoming.

[9] Annual-wage formula; high-quarter wages not used in computing weekly benefit amount.

[10] Based on unemployment fund greater than 1¼ times the highest amount of benefits paid during any 12 consecutive months. When the fund drops below this amount the maximum potential benefits, duration, and maximum weekly benefit amount will be lowered.

[11] Actual benefits are paid for 2-week periods at twice the amounts specified.

[12] Impossible to estimate benefits on the basis of the assumed data, because formula does not utilize either high-quarter or base-year wages for weekly benefit amount or duration.

[1] Except interest, which is credited and reported by the U. S. Treasury; data in columns 12–15, partially estimated as indicated in footnote 6; and data in column 18 which was estimated as indicated in footnote 8.

[2] Represents contributions plus penalties and interest from employers; interest earned by State accounts in unemployment trust fund; and contributions from employees. Also includes the excess of contributions on wages earned by railroad workers through June 30, 1939, over the amounts transferred to the railroad unemployment insurance account, and refund of $41,000,000 by Federal Government to 13 States, Alaska, and Hawaii, collected on pay rolls for 1936 under title IX of the Social Security Act.

[3] Adjusted for voided benefit checks. Includes benefits paid to railroad workers through June 30, 1939.

[4] Represents sum of balances at end of month in State clearing account, benefit-payment account, and unemployment-trust-fund account maintained in the U. S. Treasury (column 2 minus column 3).

[5] Comparisons are valid only among States which initiated benefit payments at same time.

[6] Wages under $3,000 for 1939, 1940, and 1941 were assumed to be equal to taxable wages in those States and years where the $3,000 limitation on taxable wages was in effect; for Nevada and Idaho the 1941 United States ratio between taxable and total wages (excluding 4 States) was applied to each annual wage total reported by the two States; in all other instances the ratio between taxable and total wages reported by a State for the first year throughout which the $3,000 limitation was in effect was applied to the annual wage totals reported by that State for all previous years. 1942 wages under $3,000 were estimated from United States income predictions for 1942 prepared by the Department of Commerce, taken in conjunction with data reported on Forms ES–202 for the first 2 quarters of 1942 and on Forms ES–203 for 1941.

[7] Data in column 17 indicate what percentage of the covered workers employed in the State at the end of September could, from present funds, be paid all the benefits due them in the event of an immediate wholesale layoff of long duration, under the following assumptions: (1) the weekly benefit amount of each claimant would be 10% higher than the average prevailing in the State during the fourth quarter of 1942 (as determined by dividing the amount of benefits paid out for total unemployment during that quarter by the number of weeks of total unemployment compensated) and (2) all claimants would be eligible for the maximum number of weeks of benefits payable under the State law, during a single spell of unemployment, to a claimant receiving the assumed weekly benefit amount. (For Wisconsin, claimants were assumed to have only one base period employer.)

[8] Data in column 18 indicate what percentage of the covered workers employed in the State at the end of September could, from present funds, be paid all the benefits due them in the event of an immediate wholesale lay-off of at least 6 months' duration, if the State's present benefit formula were replaced by a formula providing for a uniform duration of 26 weeks of benefits and a weekly benefit amount equal to 1/26 of high quarter earnings, with a $5 minimum and a $20 maximum. The average weekly benefit amount used for each State in these calculations is equal to the assumed weekly benefit amount used for the purposes of column 17 (see assumption (1) in footnote 7), multiplied by a factor, separately estimated for each State, to take account of the difference between the State's present formula for determining weekly benefit amount and the uniform formula described above. For Utah this factor is equal to 1.00, since the uniform weekly benefit amount formula is identical with Utah's. For other States it varied from 0.99 (Michigan) to 1.56 (Maine). For States with a "high quarter" formula, this factor was obtained by estimating a distribution of high quarter earnings (weighted by number of checks) from data reported in column II of the 1941 Form ES–215, and determining from this distribution the ratio of the average check (for total unemployment during 1941) under the uniform formula to the actual average check. For States where the weekly benefit amount is based on annual wages, it was necessary to use, in addition, available information on the relationship between annual wages and high quarter wages.

[10] Based on 49 States paying benefits Jan. 1, 1939.

CONFIRMATION BY THE SENATE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL EMPLOYEES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday, and in accordance with many precedents, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business (Senate bill 575) be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2753, a bill making appropriations to carry out the provisions of an act to promote the defense of the United States, commonly known as the lend-lease bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MAYBANK in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the requested action rather conforms to my views as expressed yesterday. I suggested to the able Senator in charge of the bill that he proceed first with the appropriation bill. I am anxious to get through with the appropriation bills. All of us are. They are important; I think they are much more important than the bill which the distinguished Senator has asked permission to lay aside temporarily. I shall make no objection, because I am anxious to get through with the appropriation bill. Then it can be followed by the bill which is on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the Senator from Tennessee has just requested unanimous consent to have the pending business laid aside and to have the Senate consider the appropriation bill. Yesterday that question arose. I did not state positively that I would object to such a request, although I did so infer.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Oregon. The appropriation bill which is now sought to be made the pending business is of far greater importance than the unfinished business, which is the bill of the Senator from Tennessee. I was of that opinion yesterday. I saw no reason why an important appropriation bill should not be made the pending business at that time. That was my purpose, Mr. President, and I told the distinguished and able senior Senator from Tennessee that I would object to a unanimous-consent request to make the so-called McKellar bill the pending business, in preference to the appropriation bill.

Accordingly, the Senator from Tennessee moved to take up the so-called McKellar bill and to make it the unfinished business. That was his choice, not mine. The Senate agreed with the Senator from Tennessee, and by inference, at least, said that his bill was of more importance than the appropriation bill. I disagree with that sentiment, but evidently that is what the Senate desired. I indicated yesterday that I would object to the pending unanimous-consent request, and I shall object. I desire, however, to state the parliamentary situation: The Senate has in its own hands the power to take up any bill it wants to consider. If the Senator from Tennessee or any other Senator wants to make a motion to lay aside the unfinished business and to take up the appropriation bill, I shall be most glad to support such a motion. I think the appropriation bill should be made the pending business by appropriate action, just such action as was taken yesterday afternoon. For that reason, and that reason alone, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and as a member of the subcommittee to which was referred Senate bill 575, the unfinished business, and on behalf of the able Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] and a majority of the Judiciary Committee, it seems quite appropriate that a statement be made on the bill which is now pending so that the Senate may know the views of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary. I shall attempt, briefly as possible, to make such an explanation. I shall not take up the time of the Senate to too great an extent, but I shall ask the courtesy of the Senate that I may conclude the explanation without interruption. At the conclusion I shall have no objection to trying to answer questions.

At the outset, Mr. President, let me say that this bill was introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. It was the subject of long, and I think careful, study, as a result of which a majority of the committee reported to the Senate the bill which is now the unfinished business.

Before we reported the bill to the Senate we amended it in a number of particulars. The amendments will be found in the bill. The amendments, taken with the bill as a whole, are exceedingly important. By every fair amendment to which we could resort we brought forward for the consideration of the Senate the vital question which we think is involved in the bill introduced by the able Senator from Tennessee.

The bill as reported provides for appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of civilian officers in the executive branch of the Government who are appointed without regard to civil-service laws, and whose duties involve policy-making functions or the exercise of executive discretion, or whose rate of compensation is in excess of $4,500 per annum, excepting from the provisions artisans and craftsmen.

Perhaps it might be well at this point, in fairness to my friends on the Judiciary Committee, and to the able members of that committee who will present their views on this bill, to say that the bill does not come before the Senate by a unanimous vote of the Committee on the Judiciary. I am presenting now the views of the majority of the committee. I say that so that the Senate may give proper consideration and heed not only to the explanation which I, representing the Judiciary Committee on this occasion, shall make, but also to the explanations of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee who may follow me.

Persons appointed or promoted under the classified civil service; persons whose compensation is paid from the appropriation for the White House office in the Executive Office of the President; persons employed in the Federal Bureau of Investigation; and persons who have left the Government service to serve in the armed forces are exempt from the provisions of the bill. I think it is worth while, even at the risk of repetition, to cause the Senate to dwell upon those exceptions as set out in the bill. Persons appointed or promoted under the classified civil service; persons whose compensation is paid from the appropriation for the White House office in the Executive Office of the President; persons employed in the Federal Bureau of Investigation; and persons who have left the Government service to serve in the armed forces are exempt from the provisions of the bill.

Section 1 requires Presidential appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of all persons defined in section 2, and not exempt in section 3. Section 1 further provides that no such person subject thereto shall hold office after June 30, 1943, unless he shall have been so appointed, with the exception that if a nomination to such office or position has been submitted to the Senate prior to June 30, 1943, such person may continue in office until September 30, 1943.

Section 2 of the bill defines the persons who must be appointed pursuant to section 1, while section 3 defines the persons who are not affected by section 1.

The Senate, in reading the bill with the amendments, will note the care which the Committee on the Judiciary sought to apply so as to define the groups which would be subject to the provisions of the bill and those which might be exempted. It impresses the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, that a general statement as to the policy of this legislation might be proper to be presented to the Senate.

Let it be remembered that article II, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States provides that the President—> shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

This provision of the Constitution, for the purpose of appointment, divides all officers into two classes—those which are specifically enumerated therein as requiring Presidential appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—including those whose appointment is not otherwise provided for—and those appointments which Congress may deem it wise to invest in the President alone, or in the courts, or in the heads of departments, or in all three if desirable.

From time to time Congress has exercised its discretion with respect to vesting appointments in the second category. When constitutionally done, these delegations have been upheld without exception. When such delegations have been made to persons or agencies not included within the second category, such acts have been declared unconstitutional by the courts.

There was a period in our early history when the question of whether Congress could attach qualifications to offices for which the power of appointment had been delegated was much labored. It was argued with many refinements and niceties. Fortunately, this question has long been settled law and it would not now be seriously contended that Congress has not the legislative power to prescribe qualifications for office, or for appointment.

In this connection I refer to volume 13 of the Opinions of the Attorney General, page 520, and a number of cases cited therein.

Under the Constitution, Congress has at all times retained the right to pass upon the qualifications and ability of those who perform executive functions for the Government, either through confirmation by the Senate of Presidential appointments, or by virtue of its unquestioned right to prescribe qualifications for office in the Federal Government, together with its unquestioned right to repeal, at any time, any act which may have authorized appointments by the President, the courts of law, or the heads of departments.

There was a very good reason for including in the Constitution a method by which appointments in the Federal Government could be controlled. That reason was well known to those who drafted the Constitution with the taste of despotic tyranny still on their lips. That reason has not changed. It is still with us today. In fact, it is of even greater importance now than in all the history of our Government. Specifically, it has been ably summed up in the words of Abraham Lincoln:

> Government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

Under the Constitution the several States of the United States are sovereign. I repeat that expression because in recent times it would appear as though many were of a different turn of mind. Under the Constitution the several States of the United States are sovereign. This is no idle conjecture. The tenth amendment to the Constitution expressly provides:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Every precaution and safeguard was taken in the Constitution to preserve the sovereignty of the States and to protect the rights of the people of the States. Those who framed the Constitution realized that everyone who administers the laws of the United States, regardless of salary or title or office, directly affects the States, and the people of the States. To this end, the Supreme Court has repeatedly refused to pass upon the qualifications of persons for office, realizing the effect of such office upon the people and the States, and realizing the power of Congress to compel suitable appointments in behalf of the people.

In the outstanding case of Keim v. United States (177 U. S. 293) we find the expression of the Court exceedingly emphatic in the following words:

> The appointment to an official position in the Government, even if it be simply a clerical position, is not a mere ministerial act, but one involving the exercise of judgment. The appointing power must determine the fitness of the applicant; whether or not he is the proper one to discharge the duties of the position.

It is essential that the fitness of Federal employees be properly ascertained if a proper administration of the laws of the United States, in relation to the several sovereign States, is to obtain.

In keeping with the letter and spirit of the Constitution that the power of appointment be not lightly regarded, the Supreme Court has decided in a long line of cases that the term "Heads of departments," in whom Congress may lawfully vest the appointment of inferior officers, means one of the members of the President's Cabinet. It does not mean, nor include, a mere bureau head or division head, or section chief.

The Committee on the Judiciary respectfully refers the Senate to the outstanding cases of United States v. Germaine (99 U. S., p. 508); Burnap v. United States (252 U. S., p. 512); Steele v. United States (267 U. S., p. 505). Moreover, it has likewise been determined that while Congress may distribute the appointment of inferior officers at its pleasure among the President alone, the courts of law, and heads of departments, it has no power to vest appointments elsewhere, either directly or indirectly. Attempted delegations to inferior officers, or elsewhere, have been held unconstitutional. I respectfully refer to volume 4 of Opinions of the Attorney General, and also volume 13 of Opinions of the Attorney General, at page 515, and the cases therein cited. Yet today, appointments to responsible executive offices of the Government are being indiscriminately exercised by inferior officers in the executive agencies. The Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate views with alarm the astonishing growth of responsible Government positions which are today being filled without regard to these clear constitutional principles. High-salaried positions in the executive agencies have mushroomed almost overnight. I have before me a table which lists for a majority of the agencies the number of executive officers receiving $4,500 or more as of November 1, 1942. It is not conclusive, but more recent figures are presently unobtainable.

Listen to this list and to the number on the list who are drawing down $4,500 or more. The agencies I shall mention were in existence on November 1, 1942; most of them are now in existence, and there are even more of them.

Bureau of the Budget: Total number of employees, 511; number of employees receiving over $4,500 per annum, 178.

National Resources Planning Board: Total number of employees, 292; number of employees receiving over $4,500, 85.

Office for Emergency Management, liaison office: Total number of employees, 7; number of employees receiving over $4,500, 5.

Division of Central Administrative Service: Total number of employees, 5,375; number of employees receiving over $4,500, 85.

Office of Alien Property Custodian: Number of employees, 971; number of employees receiving over $4,500, 213.

Office of Civilian Defense: Total number of employees, 1,334; number of employees receiving over $4,500, 178.

Office of Coordinator, Inter-American Affairs——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me call attention to the Office of Civilian Defense, where, as the Senator says, 178 employees are receiving salaries in excess of $4,500. Those officials are not employed by the President; they are not employed by the head of any department; they are not employed by the courts; they are not employed by the President and the Senate together. They are employed by somebody we do not know; they are employed by somebody in the particular set-up. Who knows by whom the 178 employees of the O. C. D. receiving in excess of $4,500 are appointed? I doubt if there is a Senator who can tell by whom any of them are appointed.

Mr. McCARRAN. It is the spirit and intendment of the pending legislation to take care of that situation, because, under our oath as Members of Congress, we are charged with the responsibility of conserving the money of the taxpayers of America and, being so charged, we should know who draws these salaries, who makes the appointments, what are the qualifications of the appointees, and whether or not they are qualified to fill the positions.

Mr. President, it is unnecessary to take the time of the Senate to read the entire list, but I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this place in my remarks, by way of explanation, the list of offices, the total number of employees, and the total number of employees receiving over $4,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The list is as follows:

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I desire to call his attention to the Office of Price Administration. The employees of that office are not appointed by the President nor by the head of any department nor by the courts nor by the President of the Senate together.

Mr. McCARRAN. In that office the total number of employees is 35,720, of whom 2,010 receive in excess of $4,500 a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; 2,010 employees in the O. P. A. receive in excess of $4,500, and yet nobody under heaven, except Mr. Brown, can tell how any of them was appointed. I believe that Mr. Brown, the director, was appointed by the President, but not by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I am not saying he is not a fine man, but there are 2,009 others whom Mr. Brown has not appointed, or, if so, he has appointed very few, and whom nobody else that we know anything about has appointed. I doubt if it could be ascertained who appointed them.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, nothing can illustrate better the propriety of this proposed legislation than what has just been called to the attention of the Senate, when we also know from the current press that within the last month or so, and especially since Mr. Prentiss Brown, our former worthy colleague, took over the administration of the O. P. A., there has been exodus after exodus of groups, weeded out, I think it is fair to say, because the new Administrator found them without the necessary qualifications.

Now, Mr. President, reviewing the list I have presented for the RECORD, let it be admitted as true that the Congress has delegated vast powers in order to prosecute the war successfully. We have gone nearly all-out along that line. Speaking personally, I think we have gone entirely too far, that is, we have gone too far without applying more care, more scrutiny, more study to those who administer public offices during this great crisis.

It is likewise true that Congress has delegated vast powers to cope with emergency conditions confronting the country. It is true that many of the executive agencies have been created under such delegated powers and are staffed with personnel pursuant to Executive orders. It does not follow, however, Mr. President, nor is it true, that the staffing of these executive agencies has been consummated pursuant to the Constitution or the laws of the United States.

The argument has been made that while the power of appointment may not have been vested by Congress in the particular appointing agency, nevertheless such offices are not within the constitutional provision that the President shall appoint and the Senate confirm all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for, and whose offices are established by law. This argument has been supported on the theory that such offices have been "established" by Congress, or on the theory that those who occupy such offices are not "officers" of the United States, but merely employees. Your committee and the senior Senator from Nevada now presenting the views of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary are not impressed by this argument.

Many so-called employees in the executive agencies, by virtue of authority which has been either assumed, or subsequently delegated to them, are in effect enacting legislation by means of rules and regulations which drastically affect the entire Nation. In addition, many of these servants of the Government are wielding tremendous authority with relatively little compensation commensurate to the effect which their activities have upon the Nation. The Committee on the Judiciary has therefore included such officers within section 2 of the bill, as reported. It should be noted that artisans and craftsmen, who are not engaged in policy-making functions as defined, are not included within the $4,500 bracket applicable to all other civilian officers.

An alarming number of so-called employees in the emergency executive agencies are appointed by heads of bureaus, division heads, and section chiefs, without regard to civil-service qualifications, and without confirmation by the Senate, notwithstanding that they are officers of the United States in every sense of the word. There is no question that if Congress attempted to vest the power of appointment in these heads of bureaus, or elsewhere, such acts would be held unconstitutional. The committee believes it is equally unconstitutional to accomplish a prohibited result by means of executive orders and assumption of authority. Such employees are therefore brought within the provisions of the bill.

Those who drafted the Constitution had no conception of the extent to which the Federal Government would expand. They could not have anticipated the extent to which the Nation would be governed by administrative law, issued through executive orders. They could not have known that the number of civilian employees in the Federal Government would increase from 1,185,558 on December 31, 1940, to 2,810,871 on December 31, 1942; an expansion of nearly 2,000,000 persons in the Government service within the short space of 2 years. Nevertheless, they wisely provided in the Constitution a means by which this tremendous expansion could be accomplished, and if the letter and spirit of the Constitution were followed, as it must be followed, the citizens of the several States would be afforded the protection which they are guaranteed by its provisions, and the rights of the several sovereign States would be preserved. It is essential that the Government of the United States be kept at all times in the people, and be made to remain as close to the people as possible. We must not lose sight of the fact that the first three words of the Constitution are, "We the people," for when we have lost sight of this fact, we have lost the true meaning of constitutional democracy.

The Committee on the Judiciary, in reporting the bill to the Senate, believes that the method provided in the bill for revesting control in the people, through their legally elected representatives, is unobjectionable because it in no way interferes with the war effort; it disrupts no agency of Government; it lays no withering touch upon the merit system established by act of Congress under the classified civil service, but rather strengthens and upholds that system; it implements and assures the selection of competent persons of unquestioned ability to administer the laws of the United States; and at the same time, it assures that appointments shall hereafter be made in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. In addition to this, it insures reasonable control and supervision by the people, through their representatives, of the Government itself and of its operations.

Mr. President, in presenting the views of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, as I have attempted to present them in a brief form, I wish to say that I present my own views most emphatically in favor of the pending bill as it is now drawn.

Some objection will be raised to the inclusion of certain agencies. During the course of the discussion it will be said that there should be an elimination from the bill of certain agencies. Every agency included is an agency of the Government, and every agency is paid out of the taxpayers' pockets, and the Congress of the United States is charged with a responsibility to the people. If Congress fails in fulfilling the responsibility, then I am concerned, indeed, as to the future of this Government.

The more we bring the Government close to the people, the more we hold the Congress of the United States responsible to the people, the safer will be the Government in the hands of the people and in the consideration of the people.

In the opening we submit the explanation which I have attempted to make.

Mr. O'MAHONEY obtained the floor.

SIMPLIFICATION OF NAVAL ACCOUNTING PROCEDURE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on House bill 2584, relating to abolishing naval trust funds and deposits in connection with naval hospitalization, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2584) abolishing certain naval trust funds and deposits thereto, and to simplify naval accounting procedure, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

DAVID I. WALSH,
M. E. TYDINGS,
JAMES J. DAVIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARL VINSON,
PATRICK H. DREWRY,
MELVIN J. MAAS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as the bill was passed by the House, it would abolish the practice of taxing all persons in the naval service 20 cents a month for the maintenance and operation of naval hospitals. It is interesting to note that since 1790 this tax has been levied and collected each year from all persons in the naval service. The Senate amendment provided that commencing June 30, 1944, there should be deducted from the pay of each person in the naval service on the last day of the fiscal year the sum of $2.40 to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The Senate amendment proposed to continue the old practice. The fact that the funds are not now to be held as a trust fund to help maintain the naval hospitals has led the House Committee on Naval Affairs and the Senate committee to agree to abolish this deduction from the salaries and pay of enlisted men in the Navy.

Therefore, when the conference report is agreed to, there will be cessation hereafter of any tax upon naval personnel for the maintenance of hospitals in which they are treated.

The Army has no such tax at the present time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration and approval of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the report is agreed to.

TRIBUTE TO DR. NEEDHAM Y. GULLEY

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in this day of crashing worlds and clashing ideologies I would commend to you a man of peace; for it has been well said that peace hath its victories no less than war, and it follows—to continue the martial theme—that peace hath its heroes—its soldiers, if you please—whose service to their fellows is far beyond the line of duty. It is of such a hero of peace that I would speak to you. Today, Needham Y. Gulley, LL. D., founder and dean emeritus of the Wake Forest College Law School, at Wake Forest, N. C., is 88 years of age.

Wake Forest College has long been known as one of the powerhouses of education in North Carolina. For more than 100 years the power of learning and culture generated there has found its way to the uttermost parts of the world to bless and elevate the race of men. It is a small college measured in terms of wealth and equipment or as compared to the great universities of the world, but it is a great institution of learning measured by the contribution its graduates have made in the life of North Carolina, the United States, and, I may say with pardonable pride, the whole world.

Even as great events may be said to be the lengthening shadow of a man, so the service of this grand old school may be said to be the lengthening shadows of the men who conceived it and who, through more than a hundred years of its existence, through poverty and untoward events, have toiled, sacrificed, and given of themselves that learning and culture—that freedom and our sacred American way of life as conceived by the founding fathers of this Republic, should live on. Standing out sharply against this background of service and sacrifice, looming large in the life of his State, is the life and character of this teacher of men, Needham Y. Gulley.

Dr. Gulley was born on a North Carolina farm. In his home, in the schools he attended, in the church of his choice, Needham Gulley learned the lessons of patience, charity, the love of his fellow men and the eternal soundness and verity of our American way. During his life his was not a large forum, but in that forum he taught no isms to the men who sat in his classes. There were no endorsements of fuzzy foreign-born ideas, no mockings of American customs or concepts of government; nor did he believe or teach that John Marshall was an old fuddy-duddy and that all of Marshall's decisions should be reversed, or that Jefferson, Madison, Franklin, and the other great Americans who conceived and founded this Government were dolts and fools. Instead, he taught, as he firmly believed, that this land of ours and this American way of life was a great rock in a weary world—a Government conceived as a real democracy which should continue on the principles of freedom and justice in accordance with the original plan.

From the classrooms of Needham Y. Gulley have gone men who have become judges, teachers, Governors, Senators, Congressmen, and just plain lawyers and businessmen, and these men have become the leaders in the legal, social, political, and economic life of the State and the Nation. The contribution that each of these men has made has been in a large measure a contribution of Dr. Gulley.

Among the immortals of my State, the men who have labored and served to great purpose—Vance, McIver, Alderman, Porter, Aycock, Alfonso Smith, Poteat, Joyner, Chatham, Wolfe, and Clark, to name just a few—Needham Y. Gulley has a secure and honored place. The people of North Carolina love and revere this wonderful old man who has lived his life so quietly, so peacefully, and yet with such great effectiveness and fruitfulness in the cloistered beauty that surrounds Wake Forest.

Now full of years, honors, and wisdom, Dr. Needham Y. Gulley, on his eighty-eighth birthday, is receiving the affectionate congratulations of his fellow citizens in North Carolina.

As a representative of the folks of North Carolina, I, too, wish to honor today the service of this great North Carolinian, and to tender to him sincere good wishes on this his eighty-eighth birthday.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks certain data pertaining to the life and career of Dr. Gulley.

CONFIRMATION BY THE SENATE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL EMPLOYEES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me preface the few remarks which I intend to make upon the pending business, Senate bill 575, to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution, with a statement of appreciation of the work which has been done upon this bill by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee to which it was originally referred, and by the committee itself. I am very glad to say—I think I may speak also for the members who joined in the minority views—that we have a great deal in common with the statements which have been made by the author of the bill and by the eloquent and able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] who explained its provisions a few moments ago.

This measure is a part of the controversy which has developed over the disappearance of the dividing line between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. The subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was, I think, actuated solely by the purpose of restoring that division.

When the subcommittee made its report to the full committee, several sessions were devoted to the most careful and meticulous examination of the bill in all its terms. At one time it seemed that there was substantial and complete agreement among the members of the full committee with respect to the terms of the bill; but at the last moment a provision which had been eliminated was restored by the committee. That provision is subsection (f) of section 2, appearing on page 5 of the printed copy of the bill before the Senate.

When that section was adopted by the committee it destroyed the difference between the confirmation of officers of the United States and the confirmation of employees. The substance of the disagreement in the Committee on the Judiciary is simply this: In attempting to cure what the members of the committee deemed to be an abuse, if not an evil, the report of the majority goes two or three steps too far, and brings within the contemplation of confirmation employees who were never intended by the Constitution to be subject to confirmation, and who, if they should be brought in, would entail upon the Senate such difficult and detailed work that it would be impossible of performance, and as a result the salutary effects of the bill would be lost.

As pointed out in the minority views, the report of the committee is entitled "Senate Confirmation of Officers and Employees of the United States." There was never any intention in the minds of the framers of the Constitution that mere employees should be subject to confirmation. The significant portion of the Constitution appears in section 2 of Article II, which, as Members of the Senate know, deals with the Executive powers. Omitting portions of the section which have no immediate relevance, let me read this language:

He—

Meaning the President—

shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint Ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The last phrase "but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments" was a recognition upon the part of the framers of the Constitution that the time would doubtless come when the number of officers of the United States would be so great that the Senate would not have the time to pass upon their qualifications. And so Congress was specifically authorized to vest the appointment of these inferior officers in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Mr. President, it seems perfectly clear to me that when the framers of the Constitution took pains to grant an authorization to appoint inferior officers without the advice and consent of the Senate, there was certainly no thought in their minds that all the employees of the Government should have to be strained through the various committees of the Senate before they assume their functions as employees.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. May I inquire what caused the committee to adopt an arbitrary figure of $4,500?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the able Senator from Illinois that the salary provision was contained in the original bill. Some of the members of the Judiciary Committee felt that it was not a proper measure of the difference between officers and employees, that it was not a definition of the difference between the two, and it was stricken out.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. If the position taken by the majority of the committee is correct, that the appointment of any officer or employee receiving more than $4,500 should be confirmed by the Senate, is there any reason why we should not require all officers and employees, regardless of salary, to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course not. If we can arbitrarily set the figure at $4,500, we can also lower it to $1,200, and we can require confirmation of custodial employees, for example, in all the Federal buildings.

Mr. LUCAS. That is my understanding; and I cannot yet understand why the salary limit for confirmations has been set at $4,500. If it is worth while to start confirming officers, other than policy-making officers, receiving salaries of $4,500 and over, it seems to me that we perhaps should seriously consider confirming the appointments of all employees of the Government.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. In answer to the question of the Senator from Illinois, I should like to say that any figure in regard to salaries would necessarily be a more or less arbitrary figure. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has suggested that the figure be lowered to $3,800. However, it was the opinion of the majority of the subcommittee, and of the Judiciary Committee, that the figure $4,500 was a reasonable one to select.

The question has been asked, "Why was $4,500 selected"? The answer is that an employee who is paid $4,500 or more is supposed to have some responsibility to go along with that salary. An employee who receives $1,200 is not supposed to have the same responsibility as the employee who receives $4,500. The figure $4,500 is at least to some extent a measuring stick, or should be, of the responsibility of the employee or of the officer.

Mr. DOWNEY rose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think the able Senator from Arizona, who was one of the most diligent members of the Judiciary Committee and of the subcommittee, has in his statement laid bare the defect of adopting a salary as a measuring stick, because he says, "to some extent it is a measuring stick." Our position——

Mr. McFARLAND. Right there——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator will bear with me for a moment, I shall continue with my statement.

Mr. McFARLAND. Pardon me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The point of it all is that the power of confirmation should be exercised only as to those officers who exercise policy-making functions. That is the distinction between the executive and the legislative power. It is a part of the great discussion which has taken place on the floor of the Senate during the course of many weeks, of the invasion of the legislative power by the executive.

O, Mr. President, I am as jealous of the legislative power as some members of the executive seem to be of the executive power. I will not consciously invade the executive function. If I may do so I will exert every power that I have to prevent the executive from invading the legislative power.

What is the distinction between the two? The words themselves tell the difference. The legislative power—and the courts have consistently so held—is the power of discretion. The legislative power is the power of weighing and judging what the law should be. The executive power is the power to carry out the law. The executive power does not extend to the making of law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to invite attention to the fact that, while in a general way the statement of the Senator from Wyoming is correct, the Constitution specifically gives to the Senate of the United States, with the President, the power of appointing officers of Government, and it states that all officers of the Government shall be appointed. That is an executive function, but the Senate itself is given a part of the executive function in making the appointments.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is quite right. The position which I have taken is simply that officers and employees are separate and distinct functionaries of Government, and should not be confused one with the other. Let the executive branch execute the law, and then in the interest of merit and of efficiency, let the Executive, under the civil-service laws, select the employees who are to help execute the law, and make effective the policies determined by the legislative power. But, let us not go a step beyond that and say to the Executive, in effect, "We shall not only exercise our power to pass upon the policy-making officials, but we shall thrust ourselves into the selection of the employees whom the various bureaus and departments must select." That is a distinction which the courts have recognized.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator from California will pardon me so that I may put this point into the RECORD all at one place, I desire to quote from a volume which every Member has in his library, the annotated edition of the Constitution of the United States. Under the section of the Constitution under which this bill comes we find several quotations with respect to the definitions of officers of the United States and inferior officers. I shall not weary the Senate by reading long excerpts from court opinions, so I shall merely read this brief synopsis and cite the cases mentioned.

It has been held that the term "officer" did not include persons of the following classes: Surgeons appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions; merchant appraisers selected by the collector of customs on demand for a reappraisal, and clerks appointed by the collector of customs (United States v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 508–512; Auffmordt v. Hedden, 137 U. S. 310–326; United States v. Smith, 124 U. S. 525–532).

That is the universal ruling of the courts. There is a distinction between officers and employees. Observe that in one of these cases the Supreme Court said surgeons appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions are not officers of the United States, but under this bill surgeons not in the armed forces receiving more than $4,500 a year, though they exercise no policy-making power whatsoever, would be subject to confirmation. The same thing is true with respect to engineers.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. May I say to the Senator from Wyoming, in line with what he was just saying, that all professional and technical employees receiving more than $4,500 a year, except artisans and craftsmen, which are rather broad and general terms, would be required to be confirmed by the Senate. Whether or not they have any policy-making function—and, of course, that class of employees does not have such a function—their appointments would, under the bill as reported by the majority of the committee, be brought before the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me take an example with which the Senator from New Mexico is very familiar, and of which he spoke to me only today. The Bureau of Reclamation carries out vast construction projects throughout the West. The Bureau of Reclamation is manned by engineers and draftsmen, technical professional men, as are surgeons who were in the employ of the Commissioner of Pensions. Such men exercise no policy-making power at all. Many of them, because of the difficulties of the work in which they are engaged, receive salaries in excess of $4,500 a year, and yet under this bill it would be necessary that their appointments be confirmed by the Senate.

The point of the minority, Mr. President, is simply that it is not necessary to go that far. We shall save every single portion of the discretionary power the Senate ought to have under the provisions for advice and consent if we will be content to exercise that power with respect to policy-making officers.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator there to disagree to the words he used when he said, "if we will be content"? I think there is a high and solemn obligation on the Senate of the United States to see to it that it does not invade the province of the Executive, and that its power of confirmation is rightfully and constitutionally exercised.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think the Senator is disagreeing with what I said.

Mr. HATCH. I am agreeing with the Senator, except that I did not like the word "content." I think it is a more solemn obligation than that.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. DOWNEY. At this stage of the discussion will the distinguished Senator state to us exactly what is the rule now governing the confirmation by the Senate of appointees of the Federal Government?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The rule now is that under various laws certain officers are, by the law itself, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Such an officer, for example, would be the head of a bureau. I think at the moment of some officers whom we recently confirmed, for instance, the head of the Bureau of the Mint, who under the law, must be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Exercising the authority which was given to the Congress in the section of the Constitution I read a moment ago, Congress has passed innumerable bills in which it has provided that the heads of departments may appoint certain individuals. Sometimes the distinction between policy-making powers and non-policy-making powers has not been drawn.

Now let me return to the Bureau of Reclamation. As it happens, I find that the head of the Bureau of Reclamation may be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior. The law does not require confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The Director of the Bureau of Reclamation is appointed without confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly; he is appointed without confirmation by the Senate. That is in accordance with the provision of the law. The pending bill, as it was originally perfected by the Judiciary Committee before the salary limitation was restored, would have required the appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of all policy-making officials. The purpose of those of us who advocated this point of view in the committee was to confine the confirmatory power of the Senate to officers exercising a policy-making function.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator if that is the extent of the definition proposed—simply a policy-making officer?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to know how the Senator proposes to identify a policy-making officer.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was coming to that.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the senior Senator from Michigan, while the Senator from Wyoming is conferring with the junior Senator from Michigan, that the only difference among those of us who believe that a policy-making official should be confirmed by the Senate, has been as to the definition of policy-making officials; but I think it is probably the unanimous opinion of the Judiciary Committee that all policy-making officials should be confirmed.

I know the junior Senator from Michigan and I, and others who join in the minority views, have all agreed on that point, but in trying to reach policy-making officials we do not want to include literally thousands of minor employees, as the bill does. We do not think that $4,500 a year is a criterion at all.

My own view, if the Senator from Wyoming will yield further, is that the bill should go to the Committee on Civil Service, and that that committee should obtain the most expert advice it can get, and work out, if necessary, even the names of the officers of the Government who should be confirmed, confining it purely to policy-making officials. I think that can be done. It would be a difficult task, but I do not think the Senate of the United States should in a haphazard manner legislate, and, as I have said, include literally thousands of employees who have not heretofore been confirmed. We should proceed as intelligently as we can to reach a definition and an inclusion of policy-making officials. I think it can be done. I do not think the bill had that kind of consideration, and if the Senator from Michigan will read the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, I believe he will be bound to reach that conclusion.

Mr. ELLENDER rose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator will wait for a moment, let me say, in response to the question of the senior Senator from Michigan, that the junior Senator from Michigan, the junior Senator from North Dakota, and the Senator from Wyoming, now speaking, made a conscious and industrious effort—if I may use that expression in connection with ourselves—to define "policy-making position" so that we would secure the result which the senior Senator from Michigan has in mind, and which the Senator from New Mexico has just indicated.

Now let me read the definitions. I shall not attempt to read all the technical language, because sometimes that tends to obscure rather than to illuminate.

1. The heads, assistant heads, and head attorneys of the several departments and agencies of the Government.

That includes members of the boards of directors and officers of Government-owned corporations.

2. The heads of bureaus, divisions, or other units representing the first subdivision of any such department or agency.

It was not deemed necessary to go down into the subdivisions, but it was felt that those who are the heads of bureaus or divisions which in effect are self-operating should be brought under the confirmatory power of the Senate.

3. The heads and assistant heads of regional area, or State offices of such departments or agencies.

That was included because it was the feeling of the authors of the amendment, and the feeling of the committee itself, that in the vast new agencies, which are exercising such broad powers in the war effort, powers which affect the intimate daily lives of all the people of America, those who have that responsibility in regions and in areas should be regarded as policy making, and their names should come before the Senate for review, so that the Senate may know, and, through the Senate, the people may know, that those who are exercising these broad powers are exercising them in accordance with the spirit and the letter of American institutions.

4. All persons whose duties include the responsibility for final action in connection with the preparation of rules and regulations or orders.

The theory in framing that was that if in this vast bureaucracy there are, as we all know there are, great numbers of persons who are making rules and regulations which have the force and effect of law, the names of such persons should come before the bar of the Senate to be passed upon, and they should not be lightly appointed by executives in agencies which in many instances have been created not by law, but by Executive order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me see if I understand the application of the latter classification. Here is a man, let us say for the sake of the argument, at the head of the Sugar Section in the Department of Agriculture. Would he be subject to confirmation under the policy-making definition?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Absolutely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That would be a source of great consolation to me. Is there any way I could get at Harry Hopkins under any of these definitions? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am somewhat confused when I read section 2 of the bill, and then section 3. It is my understanding that any of the officials who are designated under section 2 must pass some kind of civil-service examination. For instance, I know that before a person can be selected to head an O. P. A. division he must qualify under the civil-service rules.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is not strictly correct, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. ELLENDER. I know of many instances of that having been done.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me answer the Senator, because that is one of the matters which the committee considered.

It is true that by Executive order the President required the appointing agencies to check with the civil service. It was merely a check. The directive did not require that the applicant should take an examination. It merely required that there should be a sort of a summary looking-over of his background.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; but is it not true that the applicants were classified?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. There are a great many of them who are holding office who were not classified at all.

Mr. ELLENDER. Are there not many who were classified?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, there have been great numbers who have been classified.

Mr. ELLENDER. How would we differentiate them? I know of many, for instance, who started at $3,200 and received a certain classification, and were then promoted, so that their salaries today may be considerably in excess of $4,500. As I understand section 3 of the bill they would be excluded from it, would they not?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is the Senator discussing the bill as reported by the committee, or is he discussing the amendment which is offered on behalf of the minority?

Mr. ELLENDER. I am discussing the bill as it appears on our desks, with the committee amendments.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator was not in the Chamber when I rose to speak. I am speaking, not for the bill, but for a substitute for the bill which I was about to offer, and the substitute which I shall offer in behalf of the minority excludes the $4,500 limit. But the provision in section 3 to which the Senator is referring was intended to eliminate from consideration persons who had in the past conformed to the existing rule of the civil service, for example postmasters, who are appointed and confirmed, and those who in the past have been properly covered in, who, at the time when they took the examinations, were complying with the civil-service law.

Mr. ELLENDER. Then section 3 would not apply to persons who were simply taken in without examination, but who were O. K.'d by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That was the intention. The intention was to exclude from the exemptions of the bill those who, without taking competitive examinations, had been covered into the civil service. As the committee bill covers this provision, only those persons are excluded from confirmation, so far as section 3 (a) is concerned who are appointed or promoted in accordance with the civil-service laws in effect at the time of the appointment or promotion. In other words, those who were blanketed in by Executive order are not granted exemption under the confirmation provision of the bill as reported. This would require, for example, the confirmation of all persons covered into the civil-service system by the so-called Ramspeck bill, with which the Senator from Louisiana had so much to do. The Civil Service Commission has pointed out to me that, beginning with the administration of President Arthur and continuing during all succeeding administrations, more than 200,000 persons have been given a civil-service status by this method. It would seem unnecessary, therefore, to be quite so rigid as is the case with subsection (a) of section 3 of the committee bill.

In the substitute amendment modifications have been made so that exception from Senate confirmation is extended to all persons who in good faith and under act of Congress have been covered into the civil service.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator said a while ago that a surgeon was not an officer of the Government.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was quoting the Supreme Court.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the Senator was quoting the Supreme Court. The Senator is familiar, as we all are, with the admirable organization known as the Public Health Service. It is one of the best agencies of the Government. I happen to have in my hand a list of those appointees who are confirmed by the Senate, and I find in it the names of more than 150 surgeons, senior surgeons, temporary medical directors, temporary surgeons, temporary pharmacists, passed assistant surgeons, who have been appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate since March 30, 1943. I believe that either the Senator from Wyoming has misunderstood what the Supreme Court held with respect to the question or the Senate has misunderstood it heretofore, because under the public health law the nominations of surgeons, assistant surgeons, pharmacists, and so forth, are all sent to the Senate for confirmation. A more salutary provision could hardly have been made. Apparently it has helped to build up that agency into one of the best organizations of the Government. I think we all realize, and especially have we realized in the last few years, what a wonderful amount of good has been done by that agency of Government. In view of the way that organization has functioned, I cannot see how any hurt was done to that service simply because those appointed to it were confirmed by the Senate.

In my judgment those who wrote the Constitution felt that the appointments of all important officers of the Government, at any rate, should be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has exactly stated it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, but the Congress has provided for the unimportant persons in government by turning them over to the Civil Service Commission. That has been done by an act of Congress.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Which is precisely what we are trying to do here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; quite the contrary. Take an organization such as the Board of Economic Warfare, which I shall use purely as an illustration, without complaining about it. I read today the most remarkable description of that particular activity of Government I ever read or heard. I am sorry the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is not present at the moment. He examined Mr. Jesse Jones before the Banking and Currency Committee in December——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator, I should like to make a comment upon his first remark before the attention of the Senate is diverted to a second.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is welcome to all my time, as he well knows, but I like to have the argument presented in a logical way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is absolutely no conflict between the quotation I made from the Supreme Court and the recitation which the Senator from Tennessee has just made with respect to the fact that the appointments of certain surgeons in the Public Health Service are confirmed by the Senate. Congress by law may so provide, and did so provide in such case. When that law was passed Congress was of the opinion that the importance of these particular positions was such that those officers, inferior officers though they were, should be confirmed by the Senate. But if the Congress had authorized the head of the Public Health Service to make the appointments without confirmation it also would have been perfectly legal.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure the Senator from Wyoming does not want to make that statement, because the Constitution of the United States specifically provides that only the heads of departments or the courts can make appointments of that particular class. It does not provide that the head of an activity for instance such as the B. E. W. or the W. P. B.——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Tennessee is quite right. I meant the head of a department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator did not want to let that statement stand.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly not, and I am glad the Senator interrupted me at that point.

Mr. President, the whole issue here is whether or not the Senate should undertake the vast detailed work which would be involved in passing upon the qualifications of a great horde of employees who exercise no policy-making powers. In response to the question of the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] I was endeavoring to point out how the minority has endeavored to cover that point. We have written into section 2 definitions of policy-making power, and then we have written into section 3 provisions which are intended not to extend this confirmatory power unduly to those who have been in the merit system for a long period of years.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator to permit me to interrupt his very valuable contribution for a moment in order that I may propound a question. I agree heartily that it is the duty of the Senate to confirm policy-making officials, and it seems to me from a hasty reading of the substitute bill presented on the part of the minority members of the committee, that it achieves that end. If we are all agreed that that should be our task why was not that bill adopted? Why was it rejected by the committee?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad the Senator has asked that question. What happened was simply this: In going over the original bill as introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, and as amended by the subcommittee which had given such diligent attention to it, the full committee decided upon the principle which I am now advocating, namely, that the amount of salary a person derives from the Federal Treasury is not the proper measuring stick of policy-making power. So we wrote into the bill a policy-making definition, and after that had been agreed to in principle, at the very last moment, another amendment was offered restoring the salary division contained in the original bill, and that amendment, as it happened, was adopted by the Judiciary Committee. Thereupon those of us who were trying to exclude the salary division from consideration filed the minority report.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. As a matter of interest to the Senator from Massachusetts, I may say that the Committee on the Judiciary did adopt the substitute measure prepared by the Senator from Wyoming, and when the vote was had one Senator asked if he might submit an amendment. Permission to do so was granted, and the Senator offered his amendment putting back into the bill the $4,500 provision, merely adding it to the substitute measure which the Senator had proposed. That amendment was adopted. When that was done those of us who had supported the substitute measure, including the author himself, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], were compelled to vote against the measure which he had offered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, both the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Wyoming have given very enlightening replies to my question, but not complete replies. They have set forth the story of what happened in the committee; but I am still in the dark as to the reasons why, when the object is to reach policy-making officials, and when the bill of the Senator from Wyoming reaches policy-making officials, it was suddenly decided not to adopt that bill but to revert to the salary-scale provision.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Well, Mr. President, of course——

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I, too, should like very much to know the reason why that was done. I do not know what the reason was. The Senator from Massachusetts will have to ask those who sponsored the amendment what it was.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I assume that the reason for it was that the sponsors of the salary amendment felt that it was the most effective way of reaching all the persons who in the opinion of the sponsors of that provision should be brought to the bar of the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. The Senator from Wyoming took exception to the use of the words "to some extent," in referring to the so-called salary measuring stick. I wish to say that it was my opinion, and the opinion, I think, of the majority of those in the Committee on the Judiciary, that a man who receives a salary of $4,500 or more should have some responsibility if he is to receive that much money.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me interrupt the Senator to say that the difference between responsibility and policy making is very great and constitutes the difference between the majority report and the position of the minority. That is all there is to it. Of course, a person has responsibility——

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, let me say that of course anyone has responsibilities; but anyone who receives a salary of $4,500 usually has some policy-making duties.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the point is that we could recite the names of hundreds of persons receiving more than $4,500 who do not have any policy-making powers. As I said a moment ago, in response to the Senator's remarks, the engineers of the Reclamation Service have no policy-making powers at all.

Mr. McFARLAND. Let us talk about those engineers. Will not the Senator from Wyoming agree with me that some of the engineers in the Reclamation Service have very important policy-making duties?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes, they do; and they are covered by the substitute amendment.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does the Senator have any fear that if there should happen to be engineers who do not have any policy-making duties, the Senate of the United States would not confirm them just as it confirms members of the armed forces when their appointments are brought before us?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad the Senator has raised that point; because if there is anything that is a matter of form, not a matter of substance, it is the confirmation of nominations of officers of the Army and the Navy. Their nominations are brought here in an absolutely routine manner, without any examination at all, even by the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator is mistaken about that. We have a subcommittee appointed from the full Committee on Military Affairs, and the subcommittee goes very carefully over the nominations, investigates them, and holds hearings; and whenever question is raised about them, they are carefully looked into.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; whenever question is raised, they are.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are not reported as a matter of routine. They are reported after an investigation by a subcommittee, and then are reported from the subcommittee to the full committee, and then are reported to the Senate. The Senator is mistaken in what he has said in that connection. We have been unusually careful during the last 2 years.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I may say with respect to the activities of the junior Senator from Kentucky, who is the chairman of the subcommittee on the nominees, that that subcommittee has been much more active than was previously the case. But the fact of the matter remains that, of course, the rank and file of the officers who are selected, and whose nominations are sent here by the General Staff and by the Secretary of War, are men of capacity and ability, and are persons against whom no one would make a complaint. In the great majority of cases the nominations come up, the form is gone through, and confirmation is granted.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. I desire to ask the Senator a question in regard to the test which the minority members placed in their proposed amendment. Particularly as to subsections (d) and (e), let me ask who is to determine whether the employee comes under either of those subsections?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There is not a law passed by Congress which does not have to be considered by the department or agency which has the responsibility for executing it, as well as by the Congress. If the construction of the law adopted by a department or an agency is not in harmony with the law, it will not take the Senate long to find that out. Most of the heads of the bureaus and most of the departments and agencies try to carry out the law as it is drawn.

The issue here is very simple, and I do not want to be drawn into any debate with the Senator from Arizona or with any other Senator with respect to nonessentials and technicalities. The issue is small, clear-cut, Shall we adopt a salary as the measuring stick, or shall we adopt a definition of policy-making power?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I simply desire to say in respect to the salary proposition that I have more trouble with the $2,500 clerks than I do with the $4,500 ones.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No doubt the Senator is quite correct; probably his experience is not unusual.

Mr. LUCAS. I say that with all sincerity.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator from Illinois suggest that the figure be reduced to $2,500?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes; if we are going into this matter, I should like to have all employees of the Government confirmed by the Senate. If we are to start in on the salary basis, and are to take an arbitrary figure of $4,500, then we should eliminate all reference to salaries, and should require that all Government employees be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator intend to offer such an amendment?

Mr. LUCAS. No, Mr. President; I do not intend to offer such an amendment. But if we are to have any arbitrary figure from the standpoint of a salary basis, then, as I see it, we might just as well require that all Government employees be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, where would the Senator draw the line?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, at this point I must interrupt, and must retain the floor for if I am going to permit Senators to indulge in cross-fire over my head, I shall never be able to conclude and to sit down. I do not desire to hold the floor. Let me say in extenuation of my position that one Member of the Senate came to me earlier in the day and said, "If you do not talk too long, you will have my vote." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not want to lose his vote by talking too long.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator replied to a question by the Senator from Arizona as to who would determine who are policy-making officials of the Government. Is it not true, Mr. President, that the bureaucracies on which we are trying to place a slight check will determine who is a policy-making official and who is not, and therefore the law will be nugatory, unless we have some provision of the statute to do it? Is not that so?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the answer to the question of the Senator from Tennessee is that the particular provision to which the Senator from Arizona referred, and concerning which he now has made a statement, is contained in the bill which the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Arizona are supporting.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but we have in it a provision that if the official receives a salary of as much as $4,500, he is ipso facto a policy-making official of the Government.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator brought up that point, because again it clearly indicates what is the issue before the Senate.

The Senator from Tennessee, with a definite purpose in mind—and very effectively, so far as legislative language is concerned—introduced a bill designed to bring before the bar of the Senate for confirmation all persons receiving more than a certain salary. The members of the committee felt that that was too broad. They felt that the power should be confined to policy-making officials, and so provided by writing in definitions. Then, after the definitions were written in and the salary provision had been stricken out, at the very last moment the salary provision was restored, and so the bill in its last form is worse than it was in its first form. Therefore, those of us who had attempted to draw the policy-making definitions filed our minority report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. My question is apropos of the question propounded by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. Has the Government suffered any great distress or wrong through the fact that we confirm little postmasters all over the United States, some of whom make only a few hundred dollars a year?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, the Senator is aware that the great majority of postmasters, who occupy the fourth-class offices, are not confirmed by the Senate at all. Only the so-called Presidential postmasters, namely, the first-, second-, and third-class postmasters are confirmed by the Senate. The Senator has pointed directly to an illustration of exactly the point I have in mind. Inferior officers should not be confirmed; and the Congress of the United States, by legislation, took away the confirmatory power so far as fourth-class postmasters are concerned.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it not true, however, that everyone who receives more than $1,000 is confirmed?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a lesser figure than the one contained in the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator was very kind in response to my previous inquiry. Let me ask him for one further yardstick.

I have complete sympathy with the underlying purpose of the able Senator from Tennessee with respect to the proposed legislation, because it seems to me that this is one of the few ways in which Congress can reach back into the implementing of its delegated power, and have something to say and do by way of limitation of the sprawling bureaucracy which is the curse of our present-day democracy.

In further contemplating the problem, I have been appalled at the physical problem of attempting intelligently in the Senate to pass upon the confirmation of thirty or thirty-five thousand nominations, because I know perfectly well that it would become a matter of form in most instances.

I have that yardstick in respect to the bill. Can the Senator from Wyoming make any sort of estimate as to how many names would be subject to confirmation under his substitute?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That would depend largely upon the war agencies—the War Production Board, the O. P. A., and all the others. Every policy-making official in those bureaus would have to be confirmed, and under the present situation, therefore, there probably would be 10,000 to 15,000, even as we have tried to narrow the field. Unless we do narrow the field, it will be, as the Senator from Michigan has said, a perfectly appalling and impossible task, which, by reason of its very size, will cause the defeat of the very salutary object which we ought to have in mind, of having the policy-making officials come before the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senate devotes an exceedingly small portion of its time to confirmations. Its committees look up the names of those whose nominations are sent to the Senate. As I recall the number, there are now approximately 23,000 being confirmed by the Senate. The number varies from 23,000 to 30,000. I do not suppose we spend one two-hundredth part of the time of the Senate in confirming nominations. The Senator can see that so far as taking up the time of the Senate is concerned, it is a matter of the very least consequence. We could confirm double the number we now confirm just as easily as we confirm the present number. The important point is that when the Senate has the right to confirm, better officials will be appointed, because they know they will have to undergo scrutiny.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think the discussion thus far has covered all phases of this matter, at least in sufficient degree to make the issue clear. I now submit the substitute which has been recommended by the minority. Let me say that as the result of a conference between the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], myself, and other Senators, the substitute has been somewhat altered since the minority views were filed with the Senate.

On behalf of the minority, I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask that the amendment lie on the table and be printed, and also printed in the RECORD, to be offered at the proper time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will lie on the table and be printed. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself, Mr. FERGUSON, and Mr. LANGER) to the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That (1) any person hereafter appointed or promoted to any civilian office to which this section applies shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and (2) no person shall hold any such office after June 30, 1943, unless he shall have been so appointed: Provided, That any person now holding any such office, who was not so appointed, may continue to hold such office until his successor is appointed and qualified or until September 30, 1943, whichever is earlier, if a nomination for an appointment to such office has been submitted to the Senate prior to June 30, 1943.

"SEC. 2. Except as provided in section 3 the following persons in or under the executive branch of the Government of the United States (including Government-owned corporations) shall be deemed to be officers of the United States and the provisions of the first section of this act shall apply to the office held by each of them:

"(a) The heads, assistant heads, and head attorneys of the several departments and agencies of the Government (including members of the boards of directors and officers of Government-owned corporations).

"(b) The heads of bureaus, divisions, or other units representing the first subdivision of any such department or agency.

"(c) The heads and assistant heads of regional, area, or State offices of such departments or agencies.

"(d) All persons whose duties include responsibility for final action in connection with the preparation and promulgation of rules, regulations, or orders made or issued under authority of any Act of Congress or any Executive order.

"(e) All persons whose duties include responsibility for determining the policies to be followed in administering the functions of any department, agency, or subdivision thereof as defined in paragraphs (a), (b), and (c) of this section.

"SEC. 3. The provisions of the first section of this act shall not be applicable, except in cases where confirmation by the Senate is otherwise required by law—

"(a) In the case of (1) any person appointed or promoted in accordance with provisions of the civil-service laws and rules, as a result of which appointment or promotion and satisfactory service during a probationary period he acquired a classified (competitive) civil-service status; (2) any person who acquired a classified (competitive) civil-service status as in clause (1) and who, having left the service, has been or may be reinstated with restoration of such status; and (3) any person who, subsequent to appointment, acquired a classified status by action of the President or the Civil Service Commission, pursuant to act of Congress or Executive order; or

"(b) In the case of any civilian office or position held by any person on leave of absence or furlough from such office or position and in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States; or

"(c) In any case in which a person is restored to or reinstated in an office or position in accordance with the provisions of any act of Congress providing that he shall be restored to or reinstated in such office or position upon completion of active service in the military or naval forces of the United States; or

"(d) In the case of any office or position in the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice; or

"(e) In the case of any person whose compensation is paid from the appropriation for the White House office in the Executive Office of the President."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide that certain civilian officers in the executive branch of the Government who are appointed without regard to the civil-service laws shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. DOWNEY obtained the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

SUPPLY AND DISTRIBUTION OF FARM LABOR

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2848, which yesterday passed the House of Representatives by unanimous consent. The bill involves a matter of not very great importance except to the State of California and possibly one or two other States.

Last April Congress passed a joint resolution which was approved on April 29 providing that persons receiving old-age assistance from the Federal Government might earn additional money from work upon farms without forfeiting their right to the pensions. A provision was written into the law to the effect that no pensioner could take advantage of it whose rate of payment was increased beyond the amount paid to him in the month of April. Prior to the time of the passage of the joint resolution the State of California—and I believe also the State of Utah—had made slight increases in their pension payments to become effective in the month of July. Consequently, under laws which were in existence at the time Congress passed the law to which I have referred, California and any other State which will grant increased pensions in the month of July would be barred.

Because of the peculiar nature of the law, it is very important for the State of California that some action be taken immediately upon this subject, as it involves the State's fiscal operations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill to which the Senator refers; and if it will not take very much time, if there will be no extended discussion of it, and it will not displace the pending bill, I shall have no objection to its consideration. However, I should not want it to displace the pending bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I introduced the original amendment to which the Senator from California has referred, to permit elderly people to accept farm employment. The Senate adopted the amendment. It went to conference, and the date was changed in such a manner as to interfere with the citizens of California and of Utah taking advantage of the law. The amendment now sought is to permit elderly people of California and Utah to be on the same basis with those of other States. In my opinion, the amendment should be agreed to, because there was no intent on the part of Congress, I am sure, to penalize the old people of California and Utah.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. In Colorado we have a fixed objective which we try to reach, but the payments vary from month to month according to our revenues. Therefore, at the moment I am not prepared to say whether one month has been higher than another in point of actual payments. Can the Senator make any observations on the effect of the bill to which he has referred on that kind of a situation?

Mr. DOWNEY. What I am asking for would place Colorado in a better position than it now is, but if after July 1 Colorado should increase its old-age payments, it would be in difficulty under this law. What I am asking for would assist the State of Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. As I remember, the law mentions the rate of payment. Would the Senator from California interpret "rate" to be synonymous with "amount"?

Mr. DOWNEY. Yes; I would so interpret it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the bill will not displace the pending measure, and will take no extended time, I shall have no objection to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Committee on Appropriations will be discharged from further consideration of the bill. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 2848) amending the joint resolution making an appropriation to assist in providing a supply and distribution of farm labor for the calendar year 1943, approved April 29, 1943, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REQUISITION OF PROPERTY ACT EXTENSION

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 217, to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to requisition property required for the defense of the United States," approved October 16, 1941, to continue it in effect.

It will take but a few minutes to dispose of the bill. It is a bill which the War Department desires to have passed, and the present act will expire within 30 days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the bill be disposed of within 5 minutes?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will agree that the pending business be temporarily laid aside with the right to insist upon the regular order if consideration of the bill shall take more than 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection the bill (S. 217) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of the first section of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to requisition property required for the defense of the United States," approved October 16, 1941 (55 Stat. 742), is amended by striking out the date "June 30, 1943", and inserting in lieu thereof the date "June 30, 1944", so that it will read as follows: "That whenever the President, during the national emergency declared by the President on May 27, 1941, but not later than June 30, 1944, determines that (1) the use of any military or naval equipment, supplies, or munitions, or component parts thereof, or machinery, tools, or materials necessary for the manufacture, servicing, or operation of such equipment, supplies, or munitions is needed for the defense of the United States; (2) such need is immediate and impending and such as will not admit of delay or resort to any other source of supply; and (3) all other means of obtaining the use of such property for the defense of the United States upon fair and reasonable terms have been exhausted, he is authorized to requisition such property for the defense of the United States upon the payment of fair and just compensation for such property to be determined as hereinafter provided, and to dispose of such property in such manner as he may determine is necessary for the defense of the United States."

SEC. 2. Section 2 of the act of October 16, 1941 (55 Stat. 742), is amended by striking out the date "December 31, 1943" and inserting in lieu thereof the date "December 31, 1944", so that it will read as follows:

"SEC. 2. Whenever the President determines that property acquired under this act and retained is no longer needed for the defense of the United States, he shall, if the original owner desires the property and pays the fair value thereof, return such property to the owner; but, in any event, property so acquired and retained shall, if the owner desires the property and pays the fair value thereof, be returned to the owner not later than December 31, 1944."

SERVICES OF AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS IN AID OF LAND AND NAVAL FORCES

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, on April 6, a House bill (H. R. 2292) to provide for the use of the American National Red Cross in aid of the land and naval forces, was received in the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The companion Senate bill (S. 676) was considered by the Military Affairs Committee on May 4, amended by substituting the text of the House bill 2292, and approved. This action was taken by the Military Affairs Committee after consultation between the Military Affairs Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee and it was found agreeable to that committee, through its chairman, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that the Military Affairs Committee take jurisdiction. The Senate bill, as amended, was accordingly reported to the Senate and placed on the calendar. When the calendar was called, an explanation should have been made, the Foreign Relations Committee should have been discharged from further consideration of the House bill, and that bill should then have been passed by the Senate in place of Senate bill 676. Inasmuch as Senate bill 676 was passed, however, on May 20, I now ask that the Foreign Relations Committee be discharged from further consideration of House bill 2292 and that the House bill be now passed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not make that request.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Very well; I will renew it tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to help the Senator tomorrow.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I knew the Senator would, because I expect to vote for his bill. So I thought if I brought this measure up now I might secure consideration of it.

CONFIRMATION BY THE SENATE OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL EMPLOYEES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, are we ready to vote?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, since coming to the floor of the Senate today I have carefully read the majority report on the bill proposing to confirm the appointment of officers and employees of the United States, and I confess that while much skill has been used in making a fine constitutional argument, yet I fail to understand why this bill is before the United States Senate, and I have not as yet heard a word spoken in the debate to justify its being here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. That question has been asked several times. I requested the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] to give me the vote by which the bill was reported. I find that it was reported by a vote of 10 to 4. Ordinarily when a committee votes by a majority to report a bill to the Senate it is reported and comes before the Senate. When it is in the keeping of the committee it is not reported to the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I thoroughly understand that the bill was reported favorably by a majority of the committee; but I have as yet failed to hear any argument made on the floor of the Senate as to the real reason why this kind of legislation should be proposed at this particular time.

Mr. President, it is always with the utmost regret when I find myself disagreeing with the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, who is the author of this measure. The long and honorable record the Senator from Tennessee has made in this legislative Hall stands forth as a living tribute to his sagacity, his courage, and his statesmanship. His long record here also reflects great credit upon the wisdom and intelligence of the people of Tennessee who have, with conspicuous consistency, sent him here to represent them over this long period of time. But, Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to this bill for two fundamental reasons. It is difficult for me to understand how the Senate of the United States can take an arbitrary figure of $4,500, use that as a yardstick, and ask the Senate and the other House of Congress to pass a bill which will require the Senate to confirm the appointment of all employees of the Government who receive a salary in excess of $4,500.

I know that, in this great emergency, there are thousands upon thousands of employees in the executive branch who otherwise would not be there. The Senator from Michigan spoke a moment ago about the sprawling bureaucracy which exists in Washington at this time; we hear it denounced almost daily upon the floor of the Senate; and, of course, from the standpoint of efficiency, it is not perhaps what it should be; but that is not strange in a democratic form of government. However, the bureaucracy about which so much is said, and the bureaucrats who are so constantly condemned, are men of all parties and of all faiths. Take, for example, the War Production Board, an agency, we will say, which is bureaucratic in form, or the Office of Defense Transportation, which is another bureaucratic agency of the Government, or at any rate, it has been so termed here; if we had any way of scanning the employees and those who hold official positions in those agencies, and who really do things, we would find that probably there are more Republicans on the pay roll than there are Democrats. I am not objecting to that, for we are in war, and I want my Government to have the best men it can find to conduct its various agencies, regardless of their political affiliations.

Mr. President, with respect to many of these agencies I have not paid very much attention to what goes on so far as appointments affect my particular State. I know that some appointments have been made which have been bad from the standpoint of having the kind of cooperation there should be with Members of the United States Senate, and some of the appointments have been wrong. Senators should have been consulted before the appointments were made. The Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] rose yesterday and said that he was giving notice that no appointment should come here for confirmation until the agency in which the appointment was made had conferred in advance with him, and that is, of course, in my opinion, right. I will tell the Senate why. A Senator who is representing his State in the Senate, at least, gets the credit of being responsible for an appointee serving in his State or district of a governmental agency which is operating in behalf of the war effort.

That is one of the reasons why I shall not vote for a bill which, if passed, would reuire the Senate to confirm 38,000 more appointees. I do not want to accept that responsibility insofar as the people of my State are concerned. Furthermore, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the public think this is a patronage grab upon the part of the Congress, and that, if this bill passes, the Senate will have under its domination 38,000 more employees.

Mr. President, I said a moment ago I do not care so much about the $4,500 employee; in trying to get information from governmental bureaus I have more trouble with the $2,500 clerk or the $2,000 clerk. I can talk to Mr. Patterson or Mr. Stimson or Mr. Knox or Mr. Forrestal, Mr. Nelson, or Mr. Eastman, or Mr. Brown and get information immediately but it is very difficult for me to talk to many of the subordinates who are getting in the neighborhood of $2,500 and obtain any real information.

It reminds me of something that happened during the last war. About the third day I was in the Army I was walking along thinking about home, when I met a general. I passed him by without saluting. He called me back and said, "Young man, how long have you been in the Army?" I said, "Three days, sir." He said, "You must understand the rule of the Army is that when you pass an officer you are compelled to salute." I said, "I understand that perfectly well, sir, but I have just been here about 3 days, and I was thinking about the folks back home, and I apologize." He said, "Now, young man, that is all right with me, but don't you ever pass a second lieutenant and fail to salute him, or you may be court-martialed as a result." [Laughter.] If there are any second lieutenants sitting in the gallery, I apologize to them, because once I was one myself. That illustrates the situation, so far as subordinates are concerned.

Another basic reason why I am against the bill is that an examination of it, with all its ramifications, convinces me beyond the peradventure of a doubt that if this proposal became the law of the land, it would retard, hinder, and delay the war effort.

On page 6 the majority report says, among other things:

> Your committee believes that the method provided in the bill for revesting control in the people, through their legally elected representatives, is unobjectionable because it in no way interferes with the war effort.

Mr. President, I challenge that premise, and that is one of the reasons, and one of the fundamental reasons, why I am opposed to the proposed legislation. There is a perfect example with respect to the appointment of men in the War Manpower Commission at the present time. The names of individuals who are appointed in Indiana, Wisconsin, Illinois, and I think Michigan, in that particular region, are all coming to my office at the present time, my approval being sought before the committee that is handling the appointments will report them favorably to the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I stated on the floor of the Senate a day or so ago that the Committee on Military Affairs would not report any nomination until the Senators from the State concerned had approved the selection, which makes it necesary that the names of the appointees be referred to the Senators.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not know what the colloquy was with respect to the question raised by the Senator from New Mexico. What I am saying is that the nominations of persons from the States of Indiana and Wisconsin, and I think from Michigan, that particular area, have been coming to my desk for approval before they finally reach the Committee on Military Affairs, or whatever committee is handling the nominations for particular positions.

It so happens that I may be away a week or that I may not be able to approve the manpower nominations for 2 weeks. Some of them I have let lie on my desk as long as 3 weeks, because why should I be interested in an individual in Indiana who receives an appointment under the War Manpower Commission?

Mr. President, if such procedure does not hinder and delay and frustrate the war effort on the home front, I do not know what would. If an individual who is appointed to handle an important job does not know for a period of 6 weeks or 2 months whether or not his nomination is going to be confirmed by the United States Senate, that individual is not doing the kind of a job he should do in some temporary appointment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know the Senator does not wish to leave the impression that any Member of the Senate would desire to delay a nomination which by law it is a part of his obligation to see is confirmed. Submission of nominations to Senators is the law now, and that is the reason why those nominations are sent to the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate that.

Mr. CHANDLER. They go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LUCAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. There they are referred to a subcommittee, of which I happen to be chairman. We have made it a rule to send those nominations to the Senators in whose States the persons are supposed to serve, or the area where they are supposed to serve, unless a Senator expressly says he is not interested; some have done. Of course, we cannot make them interested if they are not. We give the Senator an opportunity and a reasonable time, and I think Senators are not disinterested in those who serve, when they have an obligation by law to scrutinize the man and his talents, and either to approve or disapprove him. I have not had any serious delays in the subcommittee reporting the nominations promptly to the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Military Affairs reports them promptly to the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I am not complaining about the promptness or the lack of promptness on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs. I did not even mention that committee from that angle. I am talking about my own negligence, in connection with the matter. And a negligence that can be defended.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall yield in a moment. Mr. President, I have more than I can do at the present time in connection with the office of United States Senator. The State of Illinois has a population of seven and a half million and, so far as I can prevent it, I do not want any more nominations coming to my office and coming over my desk. I do not want the responsibility of having to write to my friends in Illinois asking them to look up John Jones, who has been chosen for some particular position, and give me his background and his history in order that I may intelligently pass upon him.

We are at war, Mr. President, and if we are to do what is proposed, and if we are to do it honestly and carefully, and conscientiously, we cannot merely lay these matters aside and say, "They are all right, so far as I am concerned. Push them through." If we assume the responsibility the bill says we should, we will do with these men the same as we should do with every other individual, so far as patronage is concerned—and that is how this bill will be looked upon by the public; make no mistake about it. Make no mistake about the bill, this is a bill which will tell the War Production Board, which will tell the Office of Defense Transportation, and all the other agencies of the Government, just whom they can and cannot appoint to important positions in the great war effort, and I am against the bill on that ground, if on no other.

No one can ever convince me that the bill will not delay and frustate the war effort, and I am more interested in that than I am in trying to keep some individual from being appointed at the head of the War Production Board in my State, or the head of the O. P. A. in my State, or to any other particular agency operating in my State.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield now?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. My reason for asking the Senator to yield a moment ago was to suggest something along the line he was discussing, that if the Senate takes the responsibility, it also assumes the obligation of discharging the responsibility. How many confirmations does the Senate now have; twenty-odd thousand?

Mr. McKELLAR. Forty-odd thousand.

Mr. HATCH. There are 40,000 or 50,000 nominations to be confirmed. There are only so many days in the year, and only so many hours in a day, and if a Senator rightfully discharged his obligation regarding nominations, he would do nothing else but investigate and report as to the qualifications of employees, not officers, in the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I do not wish to cast the slightest reflection on the integrity or the conclusion of any Senator who may disagree with the premise I have stated, that so long as we are in war against an enemy whose leaders have said that "Today there are two worlds, one the totalitarian and the other democratic, and one of them must break asunder," I am constrained to oppose every proposal suggested which in my opinion would frustrate or delay for one moment the hour of victory of the United Nations.

I am convinced that this type of legislation is one of the many legislative illusions which minimize our war efforts. If we do not give to the home front everything we can give in the way of legislative support, and if we hinder and delay and frustrate action on the home front, through adoption of such a legislative policy as is proposed by the pending bill, then ultimately such delay will find its way to the military front, and in my opinion will postpone the successful conclusion of the war. I am sure that if the war were not so far away from the Atlantic and the Pacific shores, we would not be considering a measure of this kind at this crucial hour.

I am not one of those who think, because of our great victory in Africa, because of the effective bombing which is going on in Germany at the present time, and because of our victories in the Pacific, that the war is going to be over in a short period of time, although I pray to God I am wrong. I am legislating today on the theory that the Germans hold Bermuda and that the Japs hold Hawaii, and I cannot legislate in any other way, as I see the awful catastrophe which confronts this great country of ours.

Mr. President, much has been said about the confirmation of the appointment of postmasters, rural-mail carriers, and others who are not policy-making officers of the Government. Such employees are used as an example of confirmation by the Senate, and that is, of course, exactly what we do here. I think I am fairly well acquainted with that situation also. Much as I regret to say so, every congressional district in my State outside Cook County, and some on the inside, are now represented by Republicans. Consequently, under the rules of the game established long ago most of the responsibility for the selection of postmasters and rural-mail carriers falls primarily upon the shoulders of the Senator from Illinois. I should like to have Senators see the long row of files in my office dealing with these two subjects alone, containing the voluminous amount of correspondence which has accumulated with respect to practically every postmaster, and a similar amount of correspondence with respect to practically every rural-mail carrier. These two outstanding examples of patronage alone demand more of a Senator's time than he should give to such a matter, and that is especially true when Senators have so many weighty problems upon their minds dealing with their Government as it affects the entire world.

Let it be said that I have made many valuable friends through appointments. I have also lost a great many friends through them. In appointing one postmaster one makes him his friend but loses the other eight who take the examination, because each and every one of them thinks he was entitled to the post office. Many applicants start a flood of letters to my office with every conceivable kind of argument. Obviously, to answer them requires much of a Senator's time. The point I make is that if we assume the task of confirming 38,000 more appointments and we give to those appointments the same amount of time we are compelled now to give to the appointment of postmasters and rural mail carriers, Senators will be doing nothing but handling patronage jobs. I do not want to have to do anything like that.

Mr. President, if there ever was a time in the history of this Nation when United States Senators should avail themselves of every opportunity to study government and world affairs, it certainly is at this hour.

Not long ago the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was responsible for the appointment of a commitee to study post-war economic conditions. I am a member of that committee. I undertake to say that if I have to handle the thousands of additional appointments which may be involved in Illinois, if I should be obliged to continue to make investigations, and constantly to write to people about this individual and that individual in order intelligently to pass upon his qualifications, I shall not have any time to study post-war economic conditions. It is all I can do now to keep up the correspondence dealing with postmasters and rural mail carriers and other vital problems that affect the home front.

The military and civilian problems which have arisen throughout the Nation as a result of the present global conflict are of such enormity and perplexity that none of us can find the time to keep ourselves sufficiently informed as to all developments.

Many of these problems particularly affect one's own State and the people one represents. We have a duty, obligation, and responsibility to the States and their people, and of course we are glad to do what we can to aid them in their quest for information concerning important matters which affect their families, or their businesses, or their community.

Mr. President, I wish I might be able to divorce myself completely from all patronage matters in this great crisis. I say that with all the sincerity I possess. Then I would have some time, perhaps, to study such a bill as the one now before the Senate, rather than coming in here and listening to arguments concerning it, and then make the argument I am now making. Certainly I shall not vote for a measure which will place more patronage responsibility upon my shoulders, and that is all the pending measure would do. It makes no difference how much one clothes the discussion with constitutional arguments, when we get right down to brass tacks it is simply a question of wanting to control the appointments which are being made by the various bureaus.

Mr. President, when I make this statement, I do not mean to say that the heads of the various departments of government should not confer with United States Senators with respect to policy-making officials in their respective States. But certainly this measure goes far beyond anything of that kind, and if we are to set the limit at $4,500, as is done by the bill, then it seems to me we should include all appointments, and let the Senate do nothing but sit here day after day, week after week and investigate every $1,200 employee in the Government, and on up to those receiving $10,000 a year. In my humble judgment, that certainly will finally happen if once we move in this direction.

Mr. President, I think the bill should be defeated. I do not speak for any one else than myself, but I am confident that when the time comes that the President of the United States carefully analyzes the bill, or has some one analyze it for him to see what it will accomplish in the way of hindering and frustrating and delaying the war effort, it will meet with a prompt and vigorous veto.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

SUPPLEMENTAL LEND-LEASE APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEFENSE AID

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, as the Senate knows, there is on the calendar an appropriation bill, House bill 2753, Calendar No. 270, making supplemental appropriations to carry out the provisions of an act to promote the defense of the United States, known as the Lend-Lease Act. Mr. Stettinius, the Director of the lend-lease, advises me that it is most urgent that the bill be passed today, if possible. Mr. Stettinius states that certain arrangements of the highest importance with Russia cannot be made or concluded until the bill is passed.

In view of the urgent situation, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the supplemental lend-lease appropriations bill be considered. If the Senate agrees to pursue such a course, it will mean, of course, that as soon as the appropriation bill is disposed of, the bill now pending will automatically come before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I take great pleasure in saying that I have no objection.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. The bill to which the Senator has just referred is the same bill which was on the calendar yesterday, is it not?

Mr. HILL. It is, indeed; I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. It was on the calendar when the Senate convened today, was it not?

Mr. HILL. It was.

Mr. HATCH. Every Senator has had the right to move at any time to proceed to the consideration of the bill, has he not?

Mr. HILL. He has.

Mr. HATCH. I am a little confused about the parliamentary situation. Can the Senate act only by unanimous consent?

Mr. HILL. Is the Senator asking me that question?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Of course, the Senator knows that a motion to consider any bill on the Calendar would be in order; and if a majority of the Senate were to agree to the motion, the bill would become the pending business of the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HILL. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Has any Senator expressed opposition to such a motion, if it were made?

Mr. HILL. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. HATCH. Does the Senator have any idea that there would be a single dissenting vote if such a motion were made?

Mr. HILL. I know of no such vote.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it is almost ridiculous that an important war measure should be held up, and that the Senate should not act, when it had all the power necessary to act, because one Senator believed the proper procedure was to take up the all-important lend-lease bill first.

Mr. President, I will have no part in any procedure which would delay the war effort in the least. If Senators who have forced this action can gather any satisfaction to themselves from their course of action, that is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. President, I agree to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HILL. I thank the Senator for his very fine spirit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 2753, a bill making supplemental lend-lease appropriations?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2753) making supplemental appropriations to carry out the provisions of an act to promote the defense of the United States, approved March 11, 1941, as amended, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendment of the committee be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the committee amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 4, line 16, after the word "thereby", to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for the payment of any subsidy on agricultural products."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me say that the measure is exactly as it was when the House passed it, with the exception of the proviso on page 4 which has just been read. The Senate committee struck out that proviso. I think it was put in by the House under a misapprehension as to what kind of a subsidy was proposed. Lend-lease does not pay subsidies and is not interested in subsidies. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

I believe that Senators understand this lend-lease measure. Lend-lease operations have been going on for more than 2 years. Lend-lease is an exceedingly important instrument in behalf of the war. I do not suppose any agency of Government except the Army, the Navy, and the Maritime Commission has been more instrumental in carrying on the war than has the Lend-Lease Administration. Its work has been excellent. It has reported constantly, both to the President and to Congress. It has made a splendid record. All the information which has been asked for by either branch of Congress has been furnished fully, frankly, and carefully.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Let me suggest to the Senator that one of the reasons why the Lend-Lease Administration is so fortunate in the results it has achieved in obtaining the legislation it desires is the personality, tact, and high character of its administrator, Mr. Stettinius, who has won the confidence of all the committees of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is entirely true.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Before I yield let me say a word to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY].

Yesterday the Senator from Michigan asked the following question:

Have any new lend-lease agreements been made since the recent extension of the act; and, if so, may they be produced for our consideration?

The answer is, "No." There have not been any, and cannot be any until this bill is passed. The authorities are awaiting the passage of this bill, and it is exceedingly important that it be passed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his dependable reply to the question. I merely wish to observe, in case anyone connected with the Lend-Lease Administration is listening, that I hope if any new agreements are written those who write them will not ignore the unanimous, bipartisan observations of the Senate Finance Committee with respect to article VII, if they wish to avoid considerable annoyance the next time there is a lend-lease appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Personally, I do not know what article VII is; but I do know that the Lend-Lease Authority will fully and promptly follow the dictates of Congress in every particular.

Let me reply to the question which was asked by the Senator from New Hampshire, which was as follows:

What amount of money has been transferred from the Army and Navy to lend-lease operations?

Here is the answer——

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Let me say to the Senator that I received the information this morning from lend-lease headquarters, but I think it should be stated for the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it should be stated for the RECORD. I know that the Senator received the information.

This is the answer:

Of the approximately $11,000,000,000 of lend-lease aid that has been rendered, about 11 percent, or $1,200,000,000, represents finished munitions procured from appropriations to the Army and Navy.

Prior to the entry of the United States into the war, all appropriations for lend-lease purposes were made directly to the President, but since Pearl Harbor, in order to integrate the supply programs of our allies with the supply programs of the American Army and Navy, no lend-lease appropriations have been made to the President for finished munitions. However, there has been included in acts appropriating funds to the Army and Navy, the authority to transfer to lend-lease countries munitions procured from those appropriations up to a total dollar limit of $35,970,000,000. This means that the appropriations are primarily for the United States Army and Navy, but that a part of the munitions procured with the appropriations can, if the President deems wise, be transferred to lend-lease countries. The authority to make such transfers is exercised on behalf of the President by the Munitions Assignment Board, which determines in accordance with the broad strategy outlined by the Combined Chiefs of Staff whether munitions coming off the assembly line shall be retained by the United States Army and Navy or transferred to our allies.

None of the funds requested in the present appropriation bill is for finished munitions. There is, therefore, no duplication between the funds now being requested and the amount of transfer authority provided in the War and Navy Departments appropriations.

I hope that answer is satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. TOBEY. It is. To recapitulate, the picture now is that about $34,700,000,000 in finished munitions are available for lend-lease to send to our allies overseas when, as, and if they need them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, on page 3 of the bill there is provision for an appropriation slightly in excess of $6,000,000,000. Subsection (e) of section 1 provides as follows:

(e) Each of the foregoing appropriations shall be additional to, and consolidated with, the appropriations for the same purposes, contained in the same respective categories of appropriation in the Defense Aid Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1941, the Defense Aid Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1942, and the Second Defense Aid Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1942,—

That subsection further provides:

and the appropriations contained in the foregoing acts, are hereby continued and shall be available until June 30, 1944.

I should be very glad to have the distinguished Senator from Tennessee advise us how much remains unused of those former appropriations, which may be added to the $6,000,000,000 proposed to be appropriated by this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will see from the report of the committee that $2,057,496,000 is the amount which will be reappropriated under that provision.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Making a total, I take it, of something in excess of $8,000,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Let me ask a further question. On page 2, under subsection (b) of section 1, there is provision for an appropriation of some $259,000,000—

For testing, inspecting, proving, repairing, outfitting, reconditioning, or otherwise placing in good working order any defense articles for the government of any country whose defense the President deems vital to the defense of the United States, including services and expenses in connection therewith.

Am I to understand that Lend-Lease is attempting to underwrite the repair of machines of war in the hands of our allies?

Mr. McKELLAR. When the President determines that it is for the best interests of the United States, or is vital to the defense of the United States, he then undertakes to furnish the money for repairs to certain vessels and other instrumentalities of war, as may be necessary.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I understand that we furnish articles of war, such as munitions and other equipment; but are we undertaking to repair them in the hands of our allies? Are we to bear that expense?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. That has been done in a number of cases, I am sure.

Mr. REVERCOMB. And that is the purpose of this provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the purpose of that appropriation. Are there any further questions?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Several days ago I received a letter from a constituent in Raleigh, the capital of my State, in which he stated that he had been given to understand by some radio commentators and newspaper columnists, and from what he had read and heard, that under lend-lease Great Britain is giving us more than we are giving her.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is not correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Is that not correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. However, Great Britain has furnished to the United States quite a large amount of tonnage of various materials, and quite a good deal of help.
